INTERESTING PHENOMENA.

Spirit Runs Engine by Agency of Man.

No danger lurks in the path of number 15.

Two drivers perch on the same bench in the locomotive's cab and guide its destiny. One is Horace L L. Seaver, veteran engineer and hero of numerous hairbreadth escapes; the other is the spirit of a man that was.

Unseen, unheard, the specter has been at the throttle for years, guiding and guarding the lives of those sleeping in the darkened coaches behind.

Number 15 is the Big Four fast express which runs into Chicago over the Illinois Central tracks from Kankakee. The train is pulled by an Illinois Central locomotive, of which Mr Seaver is the engineer. For forty-three years the veteran has been handling the throttle of Illinois Central engines. He began work as a fireman when he was young. He is now past 60 years of age and is known as the "daddy of the road."

For forty-three years Mr. Seaver has been a Spiritualist, not one of the table-raising, bell-ringing kind, but an intelligent believer that spirit bodies exist. He says he has had innumerable evidences that a spirit hand guided his engine through fearful dangers and happy escapes. Whenever he climbs up in his cab he knows that the spectral engineer is sitting beside him, ready to extend the hand of warning in time of need.

Spirit Voice Saves 1,000 Lives.

Mr. Seaver was in the cab, gazing far out along the track one dark night, wondering how many more trips he would make before the good spirit deserted him. In the train were more than 1,000 old soldiers going to a reunion at Champaign, Ill. The throttle was out to the last notch and the speed more than sixty miles an hour. Suddenly the engineer heard a soft voice whispering in his ear.

"The bridge is burned; the bridge is burned."

As quickly as possible Mr. Seaver set the air brakes and stopped the train. In the coaches 1,000 old soldiers were sleeping. The conductor hurried forward to the engine.

"What do you mean by stopping this train out here?" he demanded, angrily.

"You would better go along the track and find out," said the engineer, quietly.

Only a few feet ahead of the engine was the river, and over this river hung the charred remnants of the big bridge, which had burned only a short time before. The 1,000 veterans were saved.

This happened in 1890 and Mr. Seaver was hailed as a hero all over the country.

"But it wasn't me that did it," said the engineer, modestly. "It was something unseen, something that we do not know anything about. I did not deserve any credit at all. I just heeded the warning that was given me. There are numerous other instances where the same voice has given me warning just in time to save the lives of my passengers."

Prevents Wreck in Chicago.

One of these instances occurred at Grand Crossing when Mr. Seaver was pulling his train out of Chicago. Another passenger train, running at a high rate of speed, was approaching the outgoing train on the same track. The night was dark and again Mr. Seaver knew nothing of the danger uintil the small voice again whispered:

"Reverse your engine; reverse your engine."

Again Mr. Seaver obeyed as swiftly as possible, and startled the entire trainload of passengers by running his train backward. He had made only little headway when the oncoming train crashed into his engine. Mr. Seaver was not injured, and only the mail coach of the train was derailed. This was said to have been the most marvelous escape from a disastrous wreck in the history of the road.

"Daddy" Seavers' train is the most popular on the road and traveling men wait over in town to travel with him. They do not know of the unseen hand of the spectral engineer that sits at the throttle and watches over the safety of the train. All they know is that "Daddy" Seaver has never had a serious accident.—Chicago Daily Journal.

Tobacco and Intoxicants.

To the Editor: I want to express my hearty thanks to you for your words in an editorial in The Progressive Thinker of April 18. After referring to your commendation of women's work in regard to the use of intoxicants, you say: "With greater commendation we would encourage their warfare on tobacco, for its use seems to increase the appetite for intoxicants to overcome the lowered vitality produced by the narcotic."

It seems to me you have proposed the most difficult and hopeless undertaking that could be presented for human endeavor. It's one of the puzzling mysteries why the chemistry of the universe should produce such a filthy substance.

It's a greater mystery why human beings should like to defile their mouths with it. It not only lowers vitality, but it lowers the refined sensibility that belongs to real politeness and consideration of the comfort or annoyance of others. And it does this far more effectively than does the intoxicant.

Of this I had a most conspicuous demonstration. Three times on the street in the city of Philadelphia I was met by intoxicated men who could not walk straight, and one was supported on either side by other men. Each of these drunken men touched their hat and said, "I beg your pardon, ma'am." Their intoxicated condition did not make them oblivious to the effect upon another, of witnessing their shameful state, it did not destroy their sensibility to the effect upon others.

Soon after this experience while stopping in Atlantic City, a man who was boarding in the same house was smoking on the porch. When I stepped out and finding him smoking, retreated, he called out: "Come here, Mrs. Chandler, and let me smoke in your face; there's no sense in your being so fussy."

"Though drinking moderately has not put the drinker under social ban, drunkenness has never been respectable. But the smoker is everywhere at par, even in the restaurant, and on the street one cannot escape breathing the stench polluted air.

That it may be offensive and sickening to others to be compelled to breathe in the puff of stinking smoke he emits with much satisfaction, never disturbs the enjoyments of the tobacco smoker. It seems to escape his recognition altogether that people are compelled to breathe, whether or not the air is polluted.

What a pity that the sex claiming SUPERIOR STRENGTH, find it necessary to resort to stimulants or narcotics to relieve them from the strain upon their strength of the trials and vexations of mortal existence.

Besides, Mr. Editor, the tobacco industry, the commercial problem, what of that mightly question? A big task you commend women to tackle.

INTERESTING EXPERIENCES.

Of One Who Is in Close Touch With the Spirit World.

To the Editor: After almost two years perusal of The Progressive Thinker I have come to the conclusion that it is a magnificent paper. I intend reading it so long as it is published or I am on earth, I am a Spiritualist and have had many and convincing proofs of the evidence of spirits, and know they take a lively interest in our work and welfare. I was never at a public seance, never been "buncoed" by a professional psychic wonder, and never paid a dollar to have my fortune told. In the peace and calm of my own home, when I have cut loose from this world, and my mind is serene, and tranquility reigns supreme, at any time, day or night, then do the messengers come from the celestial spheres, sometimes singly, sometimes in groups. I have seen them, and have heard their voices. I have seen the familiar faces of father, mother, brother, sister, and comrades of my youth who went to spirit life thirty or forty years ago. I have also seen strangers, multitudes of them, men, women and children, each one as different in form and expression as we are on earth, and some of them have made such a lasting impression on me that I will know them when I join them on the other side.

The other night, after a hard day's toil, I left my body resting peacefully in bed, and found myself presently in a wonderful meadow, wide as the eye could reach, beaufully green and luxuriant. After wandering there some time, as it seemed, without aim or purpose, I became aware of the presence of another person, a young man about thirty years old. He asked, "Do you know me?"

"No."

"Well," said he, I knew you when you were a child in Dowlais, Wales, over forty years ago."

I gazed at him fixedly but could not recollect that I had ever met him before, and returned to earth without finding out who he was. The next day while at my daily labor, something, some one, some intelligence, uttered the name, David Conway, and I remembered that he had passed over when a young man and I was a mere child, but in the meantime I had entirely forgotten his existence. He awakened my memory and wanted me to keep him in mind.

I had a brother who was accidentally killed in a mine. At the very moment of the occurrence I was miles away in a forest, gathering hazel nuts, and did not have him in my mind, but as plainly and clearly as any knowledge ever came to me, I became aware he was dead. How, or by what agency the knowledge came to me, I do not know. I simply became aware that he had been killed. I started for him and saw a boy running towards me, and I knew what he would tell me, that John had been killed.

One of the strangest experiences I ever had, happened last fall. My wife and I had been discussing the nature of God. It was after supper-time, and she went to a gathering down town, and I was left alone. I composed myself for a solitary seance, by turning the light low, and lying down on a lounge. The lamp stood on the middle of the table, and at each end of it was a chair. After a few moments I was astonished at seeing myself sitting at one end of the table and my wife at the other, although I was conscious at the time that she was down town, and I was lying on the lounge. Both of us sat rigid and motionless. Then there appeared in the corner of the room a cloud like smoke, which rolled and grew in volume and thickness till it obscured everything else.

Genuine Spirit Phenomena--With a Postscript.

The Distinguished Pacific Coast Philosopher Presents Thoughts That Will Attract Attention all Along the Line. He Predicts the Total Extinction of the Fiends of Darkness on the Spirit Side of Life, and in That View He is Sustained by Wise Spirits.

Certain spirits, by declining to advance, actually go backward. And we now say further that just as every seer notes the brightness of the advanced spirit, so he can tell the grade of every returning intelligence, unless himself fooled by a spurious manifestation. Our best mediums thus make distinction between light and dark spirits. The dark spirit has lost, or at least not evolved the brightness of the one we call our angel visitor. HE IS ON THE ROAD TO EXTINCTION, AND TO ACTUAL DISINTEGRATION OF HIS PERSONALITY. That probably means that the real man within his form may have to begin mortal experiences all over again in another form of personality. He decidedly objects to this. His vibrations are now very near to earth life, and he eagerly seeks the means of stimulating his own fading vitality. Just as our invalids seek through magnetism to restore their vital force, so he must find a magnetism that is not supplied by his present surroundings. He can only find this through sensitive mortals.

Spiritualism, as its name implies, is founded upon spirit return, in other words, without phenomena there would be no Spiritualism. This is recognized by friend and foe, and fierce battles are being fought to determine whether phenomena are false or genuine. Amidst the din of battle, shrieks of "fraud" startle the investigator, and "caught in the act" has been the fate of many a so-called medium, with well trained confederates.

Such captures have left many convined that there is no real spirit return. But, on the other hand these exposures have taught many an old believer how to sift the wheat from the chaff, and discover a "spirit return" which becomes impossible to mortal fraud. We all know that scientists in Europe are now claiming to have had experience with mediums in which the possibility of fraud need not even be considered. But the same skilled investigators hasten to add that though the phenomena are "fraud proof," scientists are by no means convinced that spirits of human beings, once mortal, have anything to do with them. Some unknown force or intelligence, they say, may yet be discovered that will explain the mystery without interfering with the belief of those who deny immortality.

The writer is not concerned with such assertions and doubts. The recorded phenomena tell their own tale to an unbiased mind. Nor need we stop to discuss frauds and exposures, as we all know that everything genuine can be counterfeited. But in the Southern world, where a Northern race is building its own empire in Australia, a noble-hearted investigator has not merely built a protecting wall around his medium, but has provided conditions under which phenomena are produced that are startling to the unbeliever. The talented editor of Harbinger of Light of Melbourne is always present, and testifies to the accuracy of the published reports.

The trance lectures given through Bailey—the medium—are interesting and instructive, but, so far, are equaled as phenomena by many other mediums. The one great specialty is the production at these weekly seances of what are called "apports." They are material objects brought from a distance, chiefly from India, and deposited in the seance room under the most rigid conditions that human ingenuity can devise against fraud, by either medium or sitters. Eighteen photographs of these remarkable apports have already been published as supplements of Harbinger of Light. These objects include a large rug with inwoven religious emblems; birds' nests with eggs; and in one "apport" one out of three eggs was just hatched and with the mother bird guarding her young. Live birds, natives of India, have repeatedly been brought. Inscribed clay tablets, and manuscripts from Thibet are among these remarkable "apports," as recorded and attested by the members of this highly favored circle of harmonious investigators.

It will be seen that the powers of the medium permit repeated passage of matter through matter, which is a phase of so much interest to scientists that it will compel most careful investigation by every advanced thinker. But while such manifestations are wonderful and most interesting there are certain limitations that the student must note if he would learn his lesson.

Such phenomena have in single instances been surpassed in our Northern hemisphere. For instance, Mrs. Cuppy was transported from Highbury to High Holborn in three minutes, and deposited in a closed room, surrounded by sitters. This took place June 3, 1871. But such "apports" are rare in the history of Modern Spiritualism. The writer witnessed the sudden production of hundreds of choice flowers, each with a scorched stem, as if severed by a red hot wire. This was in a private family circle, with no professional medium present. The advantage of the Melbourne circle consists in its wise guardianship of a remarkable medium, whose specialty is such manifestations. The mortal side being thus protected agaist any collusion between medium and sitters the student who believes in spirit return will naturally ask why still more decisive proofs of spirit power do not appear?

It has been suggested that if a newspaper were transported from Calcutta to the Melbourne circle on its day of publication, or at least long before it could arrive by mail, it would leave no loophole for scientific doubt. No satisfactory explanation of the failure of several such attempts has yet been offered, either in Europe, America or Australia. It almost seems from the experience of our Southern friends as if time were a necessary condition of such transportation, at least over broad oceans. If spirits cannot bring a newspaper in a day, or a week, we may suppose the prayer rug was transported by easy stages, a moderate distance apart. So far as reported, the time of starting from Egypt or India with "apports" has not yet been attested. So all we can say as to the failure of the suggested newspaper test is that it seems as if it would take longer, or at least as long as the regular mail for spirit delivery of such "apport" to the Melbourne seance.

Now we ask: What can we know, or even surmise of these invisible messengers waiting upon the circle in Melbourne? But this would necessitate a study of mediumship as a whole, for if spirit return be a truth, there are, and must be tremendous differences between the highest and lowest spirits able to enter earth life through sensitives. It won't do to point to advanced spirits who work through both private and well known public mediums, for, at their very best they represent but one class of these invisible intelligences, and constitute but a very small proportion of spirit visitors to earth. We may also acknowledge that it is the most gross and fleshly phenomena that attract the crowds who besmear the reputation of Modern Spiritualism. In fact, even the self-proud scientist demands material proofs of spirit power that can only be offered and wielded by a very low class of spirits. The student of spirit return through mediumship must thus cover every class of spirit return if he would learn his lesson.

It goes without saying that the phenomena induced by advanced spirits are intended to help the mortal in his soul growth. They may aid one of our loved ones to prove that personality is alive after death. But as a whole they are impatient of tests, though earnest teachers of truths that concern the larger manhood of humanity. Their thoughts are always colored by the mortal sensitive, and no spirit teachings are free from that imperfection. We only reach the most advanced spirit mind so far as mortal conditions will permit. We glorify the seer or sensitive whose teachings seem most ideal, but, alas! there must be something abnormal about him, some lack of education or an imperfect manhood which permits us to give "dear spirits" the credit for his teachings.

Such are the very highest of spirit manifestations to our earth life of to-day, in the opinion of the worshiper. The spirit may be allowed to come to the front, but the mortal is always close behind him. And even in circles formed by seekers after the highest truth, we find direct contradictions on question of fact, such as reincarnation and the immortality of animals. Yet, on the whole, the writer realizes that spirit return is, and always has been a blessing to humanity. It would not be possible to grade spirit return into good, bad and worst, for nature has no dividing line in any of her manifestations. Most assuredly the present writer will not attempt any such division. But that there are conditions under which spirit return proves itself more of curse than blessing is known to every student of mortal sensitiveness.

The great truth to be emphasized is that there can be no spirit return save through mortal sensitiveness, but that includes many mortals not sufficiently developed to be called mediums. Just as there are mortals who are musicians or mathematicians and others with no such talent, so there are mortals who sense the influence of the spirit men and women to a degree which the great majority ridicule and deny. There is every degree of such sensitiveness, and when it is once encouraged and ignorantly exposed to spirit will power, that sensitive faces one of the deadliest dangers to which mortal man can be exposed. Spirit teachers of the highest grade unanimously assert that the dead mortal can climb to the highest by his own effort and aspiration. But there is no law of nature will compel him to climb if he does not want to. As there is nothing stationary in nature, man can be no exception. He will either advance or retrograde. We have been speaking of spirit visitors who have advanced, and we gladly acknowledge the blessing they bring. But spirit return includes those who have retrograded to a point at which they exhibit the characteristics of a fiend. And such spirits have a great advantage in their return. The further advanced the spirit, the more difficult it becomes for him to manifest amid the vibrations of mortal life, but, on the contrary, the more degraded the spirit the nearer he is to any mortal, himself unprogressed, who is what we call sensitive. That is a point every reader should carefully note.

We have just said that certain spirits by declining to advance, actually go backward. And we now say further that just as every seer notes the brightness of the advanced spirit, so he can tell the grade of every returning intelligence, unless himself fooled by a spurious manifestation. Our best mediums thus make distinction between light and dark spirits. The dark spirit has lost, or at least not evolved the brightness of the one we call our angel visitor. He is on the road to extinction, and to actual disintegration of his personality. That probably means that the real man within his form may have to begin mortal experiences all over again in another form of personality. He decidedly objects to this. His vibrations are now very near to earth life, and he eagerly seeks the means of stimulating his own fading vitality. Just as our invalids seek through magnetism to restore their vital force, so he must find a magnetism that is not supplied by his present surroundings. He can only find this through sensitive mortals.

The usual developed medium has his or her own controls protecting her with their utmost power for their special use. But there are numbers of mortals sufficiently sensitive to become victims to this class of vampire spirits, always in search of victims.

This is a side to spirit return the student cannot afford to neglect. He will find that class of "return" emphasized excessively by the author of A Psychological Crime, which work is devoted to this lowest phase of Modern Spiritualism. But, all the same, spirit return is a jewel with many facets, each a reflection of truth from a different angle or point of xglmaH$A fpr-Agfoffenhth'ssbb of observation. Each facet reflects only such facts as are within its point of observation. If you could assemble the facts of truth into one great mirror, they would still be but views of mortal life and experience as reflected to spirit eye. The inquirers into the verities of spirit return should recognize that all pictures or descriptions of spirit life are but distorted impressions produced on a sensitive mortal brain, and always colored by mortal experience. The advanced spirit may flash gems of wisdom into mortal life, and thus destroy the fear of death by a proof of immortality. But if a spirit is sometimes able to heal diseases and comfort the mourner, that spirit has not necessarily as yet evolved out of earth conditions. As he advances his return becomes more difficult or distasteful, and at last impossible. We may consider it proved by the law of vibrations, that the brightest spirit who can flash a thought or a vision into mortal mind is still, more or less, under the limitations of Mother Earth.

The thought the writer wishes to impress upon the reader as a postscript is that the untainted phenomena that are coming through medium Bailey under the guardianship of Mr. Stanford, in Melbourne, may be absolutely genuine from the standpoint of both mortal and spirit, but it will not do to assume that the expressed thoughts of the spirit visitors must be accepted as divine truth.

Most mortals seem ready to become illogical on a very slight foundation. Many a shrewd man and woman has watched the cures outwrought by disciples of Mrs. Eddy. They will overwhelm you with cases they have investigated, and probably pile on a little of their own personal experience. All this is legitimate, and may well induce you to seek cure for yourself, if you need it. But these men and women proceed to go farther and place Mrs. Eddy on a pedestal for worship as divinely inspired, and to be implicitly obeyed. This belittling of human selfhood is both illogical and absurd, for the fact that many are healed is no proof that the healer is a deity-sent messenger whose word is to be obeyed. This danger has not yet appeared in that little circle in distant Melbourne, but, all the same, there is always serious danger that when phenomena are proved genuine, a little too much faith may be engendered that might accept the teachings from that circle, as equally true with the phenomena. We have no reason to anticipate any such attempt of those spirit workers to dominate the mortal mind, but the fact of the contradiction between the controls of the mediums of world-wide fame should make us very cautious in accepting any spirit teachings as infallible, or even more than probably true.

AN UNCLEAN CHURCH.

Pastor Calls Trinity Corporation, Worth Millions, the Worst to Its Tenants.—Big Sum Spent in Secret. —Says Poor Regard Men Who Run Chapel as Heartless and Contemptible Hypocrites and Ought to be Consigned to the Hell They Hang Out as a Part of the Providence of God.

In a sermon Rev. Dr. Madison C. Peters, of New York, bitterly attacked Trinity Church Corporation, describing it as "New York's worst citizen" and "the wealthiest and most mysterious monopoly in the world."

"The value of its real estate alone in New York, is estimated," he said, "at nowhere from $40,000,00 to $100,000,000 and its revenue in rents is second only to that of the Astors."

After telling how through legislative jugglery the title of lands, deeded originally to "the rector and inhabitants of New York City in communion with the Protestant Episcopal Church of England," were transferred to "the rector, church wardens and vestrymen of Trinity corporation in the City of New York," Dr. Peters said:

Calls It Mysterious.

To-day there is no more mysterious order in the world, for no one but the rector, the vestry, the wardens and the controller know where the money goes, for nearly 100 years no officer has ever made to the communicants of Trinity, to whom the property ostensibly belongs, any account of his stewardship.

"The corporation has been absolutely impervious to all attacks of the newspapers and magazines and efforts of the legislature to find the reason of the whole mystery. The 7,000 communicants of Trinity Parish have no more voice in the management of its affairs that they have in St. Patrick's Cathedral. It is the closest corporation in the world.

"Trinity paid in taxes alone in 1906, $91,412.03, indicating an assessed value of $18,000,000; but Trinity's favorite lease provides that the tenants shall pay all taxes and assessments and make all repairs. Behind this useful clause much wealth is in hiding.

Where Does Cash Go?

The Trinity Year Book for 1907 states that the annual income of the corporation for the past year was about $775,000, not including collections and contributions in the churches, amounting to $80,296.98. What becomes of this $885,000? The total expense of the parish, including the charities, has been variously estimated; but is not supposed to exceed $400,000.

"What becomes of the net balance? Nobody knows. We know that the rector gets $25,000 per annum, a free house and perquisites, which make his income about $50,000 a year to preach only occasionally the gospel of Him who when on earth had no place to lay His head.

"A large part of the vast estate of Trinity are the worst tenements in New York, located in the Eighth ward. While the tenement houses in all sections of the city have improved, Trinity's have grown worse. The rookeries are overcrowded and only such repairs are made as are needed to keep them from falling down.

"Ask the board of health and the tenement house commission and they will tell you that Trinity is the worst landlord in New York. A few years ago the corporation actually fought the constitutionality of an act requiring water on each floor so that the miserable tenants might wash.

"Do you wonder that the chapels of Trinity in the downtown streets are seldom attended by the poor living around their sanctuaries. They have come to look upon the men who run those churches as a lot of contemptible hypocrites who wrap their comfortable robes about them and care nothing about the sufferings of the people."

WHY AM I HERE?

Dedicated to Andrew McClelland.

I, often wondering, sit and think,
Oh! why life's bitterness must I drink?
Why joy and pain in the fleeting years?
Why seldom mirth and so often tears?
When I would go, a drear calm in life,
When I would rest, troubles whirling strife.

But, ah! the LAW, with a tender voice
Now bids my spirit look up, rejoice!
"Ye are a part of the world's great soul,
A needed part of the lasting whole;
Thy boundless might and thy matchless grace,
Demands for thee thine own rightful place."

So on myself surely must depend
The means that lead to the certain end,
The Power that formed, hath made all things well;
With me remains the effect to tell;
The plan is right, the purpose I see
To lead me on, and by Truth make free.

Infinite Spirit of boundless grace,
Teach me to find and to fill my place;
To trust the winds that forever blow
And know the Master ordereth so;
For blowing east or if blowing west,
They only blow for the very best.

I am the man and must hold the helm,
Am here to learn of my own vast realm;
So blow the winds of Infinite Good,
Ye bear me on the ways I should,
I set my sail, calm or strife is best,
And sailing reach the haven of rest.

ARE ANIMALS IMMORTAL?

"Spiritual Immortality Must, I Believe Depend on the Acquirement of Imperishable Soul Qualities."

I am the first to recognize that my lecture before the London Spiritualist Alliance on Dec. 19 was fragmentary and unsatisfactory in its attempt to deal with a vast and perplexing subject. Though I deplore my inadequacy of expression, I cannot retract from my conviction that the 'air-balloon idea" is one essentially unscientific and unsympathetic. "Once a cat, always a cat," says Major Thatcher in Light of Jan. 11, with complete indifference to the facts, not only of biology, but also of the breeder of animals.

Though what we call "historic" times may not encompass much difference between the structure of the cat which was venerated in ancient Egypt, and its descendant which now purrs at our fireside—this stability of type being due to the duration of comparatively similar environment which has called for no appreciable deviation of species—all the evidence that natural history has provided goes to show that the families, races, varieties, and species of living beings upon this planet are in a state of constant evolutionary change. The evident common ancestry of the tiger, leopard, jaguar, lion, and domestic cat shows that the "once a cat always a cat" theory is untenable and based on too limited a view of the time necessary for the changes, and on a study of our feline friend which seems to be only skin deep. There are at present over one hundred and fifty varieties of the domestic pigeon, produced during thousands of years through human selection from one type—some of these having arrived at great skeletal differences. There are, I believe, nearly two hundred varieties of the domestic dog, the more intelligent, refined, and "civilized" of which differ more in external shape and internal qualities from the ancestral wolf or primitive Lapland dog than does the Londoner from the African gorilla.

I can find nothing in the nature of man or animals which would justify me in believing that there is an impassable physical or psychical gulf between them. Some animals are endowed with fine powers of reason and emotion, entirely lacking in some men. My St. Bernard dog is a master of thought, discrimination, and mental versatility in comparison with the deaf and dumb idiot born in the same village. My monkey is, morally at least, on a par with those savages of to-day whose murderous and thievish instincts leave nothing to be desired in the way of pure animality. I know of no reasonable argument in favor of the immortality of the idiot which cannot equally well be applied to the St. Bernard dog; of no morality of eternal value in the mother-eating savage which may not equally exist in the fruit-eating ape.

Spiritualists, and those who devote themselves to psychical research, attach great importance to the demonstrations of human immortality which have been obtained. Animals, as well as human beings, are reported to have materialized during seances; their forms and manifestations of feeling have been seen and recognized by clairvoyants. Why should such phenomena be regarded as signs of the presence of human spirits, and the same phenomena, when relating to animals, be treated as only the thought forms of the sitters, or as a passing shade which, in their case, in no way can prove the reality of the immortality of the spirit?

"Are all animals immortal—if not, why not?" asks Major Thatcher. I can no more answer that question than dogmatically assert that all "humans" are endowed with unconditional immortality. Man is an animal, and some men have as yet evolved none of the higher human attributes. Spiritual immortality must, I believe, depend on the acquirement of imperishable soul qualities. All conscious individuality must bring potential immortality. The soul is on its upward path, sinning, learning, suffering. No one would think it desirable that the lowest in the souls of man or beast should be eternal. Death and finality are essential in this sense. I do not know how much of the soul life of the rat, the dog, and myself will be fit to be transmitted to the higher life, but the divine spark is in us all. From the point of view of wiser and holier beings—which I devoutly trust are in existence on better planes and planets—the difference between the rat and myself cannot be so great as it seems to us. The light to come is a mystery yet, but what I called "modern sympathy," i. e., the realization of the wider and universal brotherhood of all living things—no matter that Naples and Paris are still guilty of gross cruelties to animals—gives a message of hope, a confidence in a great and holy purpose far beyond, yet in some wonderful way including, what Robert Burns called "the best laid schemes of mice and men.—L. Lind-af-Hageby, in Light, London, Eng.

Interesting Scintillations.

Items, Occult and Spiritual, From the World's Missionary-at-Large, Dr. J. M. Peebles.

The last Hindu Spiritual Magazine brought me the sad tidings that one of India's good and great men had passed on to the higher life. I refer to the illustrious Maharaja Sir Jotindra Mohun Tagore Bahadur, K. C. S. I. Never can I forget the kindly reception that he tendered me upon my advent into Calcutta. He assigned me several of the best rooms in his castle, and upon the second day after my arrival, he came personally from his palace and welcomed me to the city and to his castle home. The carriage that he placed at my command, with the five servants, really embarrassed me. I did not know what to do with them.

Our many conversations were upon the American government, the progress of the people, their railroads, and their many modern improvements, always running later into the subject of Spiritualism. Though a Hindu, he was an occultist and a Spiritualist, and known all through Bengal and other portions of India for his kindly nature and the beneficence of his great and noble heart. Sending for me one day to come to his palace, I went and found him quite nervous from overwork and insomnia. He requested me to magnetize him, which I did every other day for two weeks, and he received very great benefit therefrom.

Conscious of his royal nature, I admired and loved him. He never tired of hearing me relate the spiritual phenomena that I had witnessed, and he in turn told me of marvelous manifestations through the yogas of his country. He was a liberal contributor to all the reforms in Calcutta and to the interests of the kingdom over which he reigned. He spoke good English, was a persistent reader, having at his command a library of 7,000 volumes. The last Hindu Spiritual Magazine says on page 392:

"The Maharaja's latest idea was to bring out, at his sole cost, a reliable physical medium from either America or England, for carrying on investigations here.

"When Dr. Peebles came to India, not long ago, the Maharaja gave him a warm welcome and set apart his splendid castle for his use. His son, Maharaja Sir Prodyat Kumar, who has imbibed many of the noble characteristics of his illustrious father, and especially his genial nature, introduced Dr. Peebles to the audience when the Doctor's first public lecture was delivered in Calcutta. Though he had then retired from public life, Maharaja Jotindra Mohun readily consented to be a patron of the Calcutta Psychical Society, which was started at the instance of Dr. Peebles, and not only offered monetary help to it, but made a free grant of several valuable books on Spiritualism, etc., for the library of the society.

"The Maharaja died at the ripe age of 77 years, having been born in 1831. His reverence and affection for his mother were known to have been very great, and it appears that his mother came to receive him at the time of his physical death. For the last words uttered by him, with uplifted hands, were: 'MOTHER TAKE ME IN YOUR ARMS.' No sooner was this said than his hands dropped down and his body ceased to breathe. May the soul of the Maharaja rest in peace in heaven!"

The Hindus have a sacred book, "the book of the Pitris" (spirits). It is almost impossible to obtain possession of this book, which contains formulas for incantations and the conditions for talking with their ascended ancestors. This book is in the hands of the priests and at one time the penalty for divulging the secrets of this book was death.

There are "no temples in India dedicated to Brahm." He is the Ganges that rolls, he is the ocean that heaves, the cloud that thunders, the lightning that flashes, the force that moves the mountains. From all eternity the world was in the mind of Brahma, and everything that exists now is in his image. Brahm is the absolute, the immanent and unchangeable—the I AM.

The invisible spirits of India are called devas, butths, rakchasas, pisatchas, pitris, nagas, souparnas. The devas are good, the butths are evil. Magic in some form abounds all through India. The higher class Hindus called Madame Blavatsky, because of her psychic phenomena, "a black magician." The Psychical Society of Calcutta has some excellent rooms for reading, for phenomena, and are gathering books for their library. Mr. and Mrs. Armitage have a full set of Dr. A. J. Davis' books. How many Spiritualists in our country can say this and tell the truth?

Buddhism bears about the same relation to Brahminism that Protestantism bears to Roman Catholicism. Buddhism is more ethical than doctrinal, and to a good degree they all unselfishly practice the "doing all for others."

Bramjii Hormusjii's Testimony.

This gentleman of Bombay, India, writes me under date of Feb. 20, as follows: "The most intelligent of both Parsees and Hindus are anxious to know more of Spiritualism as taught in Europe and America. Very little literature of this kind reaches India. Be sure, Mr. S. K. Ghose prints the Hindu Spiritual Magazine in Calcutta, but what is that to a country ig 300,000,000? It is a monthly and has but a small circulation. * * *"

"India has a Spiritualist literature of its own, of which the poorer classes know little or nothing, and it is these poorer classes who frequent the free libraries, and these Indian phenomena are mingled with superstition called magic. * * *"

"When I was in Andambar in the Deccan last December I saw much in the way of spirit possession. The obsessed spoke in several tongues, made many revelations, and cured cases of leprosy. The cures mentioned really occurred, and thousands will testify to these facts. There are four resorts in India dedicated to the Hindu Deity, Sat-tat-ma, in whose name these cures are effected. * * *"

"It is a marvel of strangeness to Hindus who read the psychic magazines and papers, that while India contains two or three hundred millions, and America only about eighty millions that very seldom a Hindu spirit manifests in your country. Are spirits provincial? Are they interested only in the nation which they left through death for spirit life? * * *"

It is reported from Calcutta and Lahore that you think of visiting our country again. I pray the report may prove a reality. You will be received with open arms and warm hearts, and if you could bring with you a good, responsible physical medium it would enhance the interest, for while you describe the phenomena, there is a class among us who want to see it—see it as it occurs in England and in your country."

The Hindus are naturally sensitive, meditative and religious. They do not take to the doctrines of popular Christianity. They have no use for churchianic missionaries. Only the pariahs, or poorer classes become their converts. There is great political unrest in India at the present time. They complain bitterly of English taxation, and sigh and pray to become self-governing as in Australia.

The Quadian Review of Religions, Gurdaspur, Punjab, India.

The Indian Mohammedans in the Gurdaspur district print the above monthly review in English. There are over 40,000,000 of Mohammedans in India, abounding mostly in the northern portion of this great country. To these religionists Mohammed was not a savior but a prophet. It is very, very seldom that a Mohammedan is converted to Christianity. The fundamental difference between the two religions is this: Mohammedanism is Christianity, minus the several pagan elements that have been thrust into it, such as the church doctrine of the trinity, the divinity of Christ incarnate, the vicarious atonement, and eternal hell torments with no apartments in hell. The Mohammedan has seven heavens and seven hells adapted to the degree of the sinner's wickedness. There are several sects of Mohammedans, differing quite as much among themselves as do Christians. Their dancing dervishes are spiritistic mediums, with healing gifts. They are shy in manifesting their gifts to foreigners.

Spiritualism and Secret Societies.

This monthly magazine before me, The Quadian Review of Religions in India, has an article of eighteen pages under the heading of "Islam, Spiritualism and Secret Societies." In this well written article D. S. Margoliouth, professor of Arabic in the Oxford University, England, is savagely criticised for stating that Islam is a secret society, that Mohammed wore a veil; that he was a somnambulist, or a spirit medium; that he loved solitude; that he had spells which might be considered trances, etc.

This Indian Mohammedan vigorously repels some and denies others of these statements and also attacks Spiritualism with all the vengeance of a churchianic religionist. These are some of his words: "Just consider the circumstances under which spirit seances are held. There is an artificiality and affectation in the whole atmosphere about these spirits' phenomena. The mediums and their admirers make the arrangements to receive the spirit communications as much as the conjurers perform their acts. As a rule, dark rooms are preferred to light ones, and the presence of certain skeptics is said to destroy the influences. Men and women of clear heads and solid minds seldom see the apparitions, and those who do are partially under the influence of some hallucination. I do not allude to these facts to throw discredit upon all the phenomena occurring under the name of 'Spiritualism,' though there is doubtless far more fraud, legerdemain and imposture than genuine communications from the unseen worlds.

"Arabia, at the advent of Islam, and the voice of the prophet, was not free of spiritism, and there were men called Kahmins who thought that they could invoke spirits and answer various questions put to them. The circumstances under which the spirits in that past century of Mohammed, answered their questions very much as do spirits at the seances of Spiritualists. But Islam swept off these trivial pretensions with the more dangerous evils connected with that early spiritism which appeared in Arabia; and for a long time it prevailed, but was finally and legally crushed out, to the great relief of pure and true Mohammedans.

"Spiritualists, no doubt, try to create certain conditions which might lead a superificial mind to trace a resemblance between them and the true prophets of God. Prophets that are such receive revelations and see visions in broad daylight, but mediums have their trances, which may be genuine or may be assumed, and usually in the dark. Many of our dervishes and our retired sufis and saints have their visions, and they know of God and immortality; but as Mohammedans we have no use for what in Europe and America is called Spiritualism."

It is not generally known, I imagine, that Alexander Russell Webb, one of our consuls to the Orient, became a devoted Mohammedan, and has published several pamphlets, some large ones, such as "Islam in America." In this pamphlet, page 52, Mr. Webb says:

"It is a generally admitted fact that no orthodox Mussulman will drink any intoxicating beverage, and that drunkenness is an unknown vice among the followers of Islam. The only Mussulmans in the East who drink intoxicants are those who wear the European costume, and have acquired other European vices; no Mohammedan wearing the native dress ever touches liquor. It is positively prohibited by the Koran, and it is generally looked upon with horror and disgust."

The Plague and the Poverty of India.

Mohammedan pilgrims, while returning from Mecca to their homes this present season, suffered very much from dangerous epidemics. Cholera at one time claimed no less than four hundred victims per day. Smallpox also was very rife, and Dr. Jarina states that vaccination did not seem to prevent attacks and deaths from those who had been vaccinated.

The plague returns from the whole of India for the week ending January, shows 7,190 deaths, of which 876 occurred in Bombay.

The latest famine returns show 576,400 on relief, or an increase during the week of 170,000. Of these 477,000 were in the United provinces, and 74,000 in the Central India Agency.

There is uneasiness—a growing governmental uneasiness among both the Hindus and Mohammedans of India. This is especially the case with the more intelligent and intellectual. They consider themselves competent to govern themselves, and educational advantages are rapidly developing in India. The number of pupils in educational institutions in the Madras presidency alone is 1,000,000.

Hiding the Truth.

Shakespeare says in substance that "he who has a truth and keeps it, keeps what does not belong to him." One of our late American magazines contains a most brilliant and gorgeous description of the Hon. Alfred Deakin, the present premier of the Australian confederacy; but the writer of this article very cautiously avoids saying how Mr. Deakins started and reached his exalted political standpoint.

Permit me to say that I knew Mr. Deakin over thirty years ago. He was then a devout Spiritualist. He was for one or more terms the conductor in the Melbourne Progressive Lyceum. In the Lyceum Guide several articles, signed "A. D.," were from his pen. He wrote that book, the "New Pilgrim's Progress," under inspirations from the spirit world, and in my work entitled "Immortality, or Our Future Employments and Dwelling Places" (of which a new edition, the sixteenth, has just been published by Dr. B. F. Austin of Rochester, N. Y.), there appears about four pages from Alfred Deakin describing the spirit home and surroundings of Edgar Athelling, a guardian spirit.

Often did I sit in spiritual seances with the now distinguished and Honorable Alfred Deakin and W. H. Terry in Dr. Motherwell's seance room, and I distinctly remember magnetizing Mr. Deakin one evening (Mr. W. H. Terry, editor of The Harbinger of Light, being present). When in this magnetic state he was psychically taken hold of by the illustrious Burke, and spoke for about half an hour in a style clear, classic and remarkably brilliant, and afterwards by Garrick, the actor, the contemporary of Goldsmith, Sir Joshua Reynolds, Dr. Johnson, etc. The personality of this last character was entirely different from Burke, and both were utterly unlike the characteristics of Mr. Deakin himself.

As aforesaid, Mr. Deakin is now the prime minister of the Australian Commonwealth, and is earnestly and graciously inviting the American navy, now on the ocean, to come into Australian waters.

The Breadth and Depth of Spiritualism.

Spiritualism in its philosophy is all-embracing, all-inclusive. Is there a truth in phenomenal spiritism, Spiritualism includes it. Is there a truth in Christian Science, Spiritualism includes it. Is there a truth in metaphysical science, Spiritualism includes it. Is there a truth in mental healing, divine healing and divine science, Spiritualism includes it. Is there a truth in the New Thought, Spiritualism includes it. Is there a truth in Theosophy? Every demonstrated fact in Theosophy and Theosophical writings, is included in the all-embracing realm of Spiritualism. The ignorant may not know this. And, further, there are those sufficiently wary and unprincipled to write about "divine healing," the "new thought," and speak of these mental sciences, and never mention the word Spiritualism." Why? Is it cringing cowardice, or hypocrisy? What should we think of a naturalist like the eminent Alfred R. Wallace, who should write about acorns, acorn shells, acorn cups, acorn meats and their very nourishing properties, but never mention the word oak—the tall, stalwart oak that bore them? Down upon this tainted and tricky policy! If is contemptible enough in party politics, but when fastening its slimy, serpentine fangs into matters spiritual, it is absolutely beneath contempt. My soul honors independence and moral bravery—such bravery as characterized the martyrs of old, and dignifies the regal-souled of to-day. These live in history immortal, while the very names of catering, cringing cowards rot away into eternal oblivion. He who is ashamed of his Spiritualism is virtually ashamed of Almighty God, for God is SPIRIT, and Spirit is the foundation and crowning top-stone of Spiritualism. Methodism, Lutheranism, Presbyterianism and kindred churchianic isms are but passing drift-wood on the billowy sea of time. Reduced to the last analysis, there are but two ISMS worthy of profound consideration. These are atheistic materialism and Spiritualism. Thinker, where do you stand? And what are you doing for the grand and mighty truth, you profess? Have the communicating angels of heaven written in shining lines of light—upon your forehead—"Well done, good and faithful servants?" Have they? —Have they? Guardian spirits, listen to their answers. Immortality is more than money, more than tariffs, more than navies. These perish—all perish. Only the spiritual endures forever.

WATERED STOCK.

Ninety-five Per Cent is Water.—The Watering Process, Spiritually and Otherwise.—Its Terribly Demoralizing Effects.

We learn from the Chicago Record-Herald that when Thomas F. Ryan was before the special grand jury investigating the affairs of the Metropolitan Street Railway Company, New York, he said that ninety-five per cent of the stock of all railroad corporations in this country never cost a dollar.

There was great surprise and many of the jurors questioned Mr. Ryan, believing they had misunderstood, but the only one in the room who manifested no surprise was Mr. Jerome, who before Mr. Ryan appeared before the jury had carefully gone over all the testimony with him.

Ryan's remark was made after Mr. Jerome had read to the grand jury the statement prepared by the witness, which Ryan gave out for publication last Monday evening.

Why Ryan's statement was read by Jerome has not been explained. Some said Ryan was not a good reader; others that his voice was not as penetrating as Jerome's.

Ryan had figured out that the $52,000,000 of Metropolitan Street Railway stock represented cash payments of 83⅓ per cent of its par value. As Mr. Jerome read this statement Ryan interrupted, saying:

"Gentlemen, that is the answer to the statement that has been made for the last five years that the Metropolitan Street Railway Company stock is all water."

Mr. Jerome promptly came to the witnesses' rescue, saying: "Mr. Ryan, you have been connected with a large number of corporate ventures, both in street railways and in steam railways, have you not?"

"Yes, sir," answered Ryan.

"And as a banker you have been familiar with the capitalization of many of the railroads of this country, have you not?"

"Yes, sir."

"How will that compare—that percentage of water, if you call it such?"

"Ninety-five per cent of the stock of railroad corporations of this country never cost a dollar," was Mr. Ryan's declaration.

"You mean," said Mr. Jerome, "that ninety-five per cent of the stock of the railroads of this country is all water?"

"Yes."

"Please explain,' said Mr. Jerome.

"Well," said Mr. Ryan, "the railroads in the last of the great speculative years that we have had have put up stock so that it was easy to raise money on stocks and bonds; but up to 1885 ninety-five per cent of all steam railroads and industrial corporations of this country never put in one dollar on their stock except a little organization expenses that were required for a few shares of stock in the beginning."

"So then," said Mr. Jerome, "your experience in these matters is that $83.50 cash paid in for every $100 in stock is exceptional."

Little Money Paid.

"Yes, sir. Up to 1878 there was not a dollar paid in on St. Paul, Northwestern, Omaha or any of these railroads."

Mr. Jerome asked Mr. Ryan for a further explanation, but the witness waited until the district attorney put another question.

"If you took these roads as they stand to-day, including the roads that have been organized and supposed to be put on a sound basis, taking them as a whole, both in steam railroading and surface railroading, would $83.50 in cash for every share of $100 par be a large percentage of cash?"

"A large percentage," replied Mr. Ryan. "Ninety-five per cent of them haven't anything. No only that, in the reorganization that took place from 1900 up to 1907, they assessed these stocks and bonds."

"Mr. Ryan," said one of the grand jurors, "we understand then that the roads only cost about five per cent of the capital issue? They were built with bonds?"

"Built with bonds," said Mr. Ryan. "The Union Pacific Railroad was built with bonds and got a land grant worth $250,000,000."

"And Atchison the same?" said another grand juror.

"Atchison the same."

Here you have an astounding revelation, a crime against humanity and the civilization of the present age, a rottenness that can only be equaled by the ancient city of Babylon, and which to-day is SECRETING A SUBTLE OCCULT POISON tending towards the destruction of this country, as the same conditions did in ancient Rome and other corrupt nations. Watered stock! Alas, it is found in Spiritualism, whenever a bogus test is given or deception practiced.

DIVINE WRIGHT.

Anniversary at St. Louis, Mo.

To the Editor: Some of the pessimistic friends who believe Spiritualism organically to be on the decline, should have been present Sunday, April 26, at Schuette's hall, 19th and Wright streets, where the first anniversary of the Truthseekers' Society was held. When your writer arrived at the hall at 2:30 p. m. the rain was descending in torrents. We were met at the door by the pastor, Mrs. F. Gallo, whom we began to condole with, because of her bad luck. With a laugh she replied by inviting us to look in, which we did and to our astonishment every seat was occupied, and they still continued to come until fully 175 people were in the hall. Had the weather been favorable I believe they would have been obliged to turn many away. The audience, too, was an intelligent-appearing one as we ever faced. Among the many familiar faces we noted Mr. D. Boyle, a prominent lawyer of East St. Louis, and wife; Prof. Chrisman, president of the Columbia Business College of this city; Mr. Pauls, state secretary of the Socialist organization; Mr. and Mrs. Stacklin, and many others whom space forbids mention of.

The exercises opened promptly at 3 o'clock with congregational singing, followed by an invocation by the pastor. Your writer delivered the opening address, our topic being, "Spiritual Development, Scientifically Considered." Our State Secretary, Dr. Vierling, followed with a ringing address on, "The Progress of Our Movement," which was heartily applauded. His good wife followed with messages which cheered and consoled many. Next came Mrs. Nelson Armstead, whose tests were as fine as any I ever listened to, and all recognized. The pastor, Mrs. F. Gallo, succeeded Mrs. Armstead and the accurate manner with which she delivered her messages spoke volumes as to the cause of her success in the brief year she has been pastor for the Truthseekers' Society. At the close of the afternoon exercises our material wants were amply provided for by the ladies of the society, and the long tables were filled with a happy, joyous crowd, who looked and acted as if their religion agreed with them. There was a certain pineapple layer-cake that Mr. Boyle and myself endeavored to corner, but the ladies promptly and successfully broke up our unlawful combination. I hereby recommend them to Teddy as successful "Trust busters."

The evening exercises opened at 8 o'clock with a much larger audience, although the weather was still inclement. Your writer again delivered the opening address and was invited by the pastor to continue the subject on the following Sunday. Mrs. Mattie McCaslin, the tried and true veteran in Spiritualistic work, came next and matched my darky story with another still more laughable. Our good sister, E. P. Price, followed with messages and was at her best. She had just returned the evening before from an engagement in Kansas City, but was as full of vim as ever. Mrs. Gallo came next, delivering her messages of love and good cheer in her usual excellent way. Last but not least Dr. H. Faber delivered the closing address, his thoughtful logic causing many to see new points of interest in the study and investigation of Spiritualism. All went away feeling well repaid for their trouble in venturing out upon such a night.

Germs of Mind in Plants By R. H. France, Translated by A. M. Simons.—Cloth, Illustrated, 50 Cents. A cardinal point in the philosophical systems favored by the ruling classes is that the mind of man is something unique in the universe, governed by laws of its own that have no particular connection with physical laws. Modern science has proved that not only animals, but also plants receive impressions from the outside world and use data thus obtained to modify their movements for their own advantage, exactly as human beings do. These facts are told in this book in so charming and entertaining a style that the reader is carried along and does not realize until later the revolutionary significance of the facts.

A LEADING MAGAZINE.

Presents Some of the Grand Truths of Spiritualism, to Reach Its Numerous Readers.

No subject of thought appeals more powerfully to the human mind than the life after this. Elizabeth Stuart Phelps, who wrote The Gates Ajar almost half a century ago, is now writing papers on "The World Invisible" for Harper's Bazaar. It is an interesting literary offering this, and American readers will wish to know what Elizabeth Stuart Phelps thinks NOW of the hereafter as compared with what she thought then. She says, among other things:

"If the next life is to give to the fit survivor the realization of denied things, there must be involved, to a certain extent, the restitution of lost things. No preacher, no teacher, no writer who ventures to approach the mysteries of the unknown life ever escapes the bombardments of one question, more often repeated, more poignant than all others, 'Shall I find the soul I loved?'

"If it is worth loving and if you are worthy to love it—yes. Since God, who is love, gave you love capacity, and since fate, which may or may not be God, starved you with love famine—yes. By every broken heart, by every widowed sob, by every grief too great for tears, by every flower of pure and perfect love broken at its roots in the garden of your trampled being—yes.

"I am ready to say without hesitation that for the love-worthy the next world must fulfil the obligations of this one, and that the restoration of our borrowed dead is one of the most legal of such obligations."

"I am often asked if I still believe in the doctrines of the little book whose heresies marked the incident of my youth. In the main—yes. In substance, assuredly I do. With whatever discontent I may now rate the book as a specimen of literary art, I cannot cease to feel respect for it as an episode of religious development. The times were rich for a blossoming truth. If The Gates Ajar appeared as a new publication now it would scarcely excite remark. The heresy of the sixties has become the credo of 1900. To-day who expects to stand in a row with other musical ghosts around a throne? Who anticipates a white robe and a palm branch, a hymn book, and an eternal prayer meeting as the accessories of his future lot?

"I am not afraid to say that the deepest longing of the individual nature, if turned in the high direction, must be gratified in a reasonable heaven. These personal preferences of the soul can no more be exchanged than a complexion or a voice."

"If I could be out of physical pain," said a lifelong invalid, "I would ask no other heaven." "If I could be in a place where I might know my husband never COULD be killed on the train!" cried one of the gentle "worriers" whose capacity for suffering is neither understood nor respected by the sanguine. * * * "If I could take my children to a world where every time I hear a croupy cough my heart did not stand still with terror," urged another, "that would be heaven for me." The mulatto girl who burst into joyful tears at first sight of a marble bust of herself, "because it was white," had a glimpse of her heaven before its time.

"Heaven must be like any other form of happiness, only 'more so.'" said a thoughtful man. "And the conditions of happiness are three: A clean conscience, something to do, and some one to love."

BOSTON EMMANUEL CLINIC.

An Excellent Work of the Church.

Harper's Bazar is determined that its readers shall have the benefit of the Emmanuel Church work in Boston, if they need it. So the editor of the Bazar has persuaded the Rev. Samuel McComb to write about how nervous women in his church are helped to help themselves. He says, among other things, in the May Bazar:

"The Emmanuel Clinic in Boston aims not only at directly helping sufferers by well-known therapeutic measures, such as suggestion administered in a waking or hypnotic state, psycho-analysis, moral and religious re-education, and so forth, but also at helping them to help themselves. I will briefly describe a few typical cases which may, perhaps, encourage other sufferers to set about the task of self-cure. A sufferer from functional insomnia was enabled to rid himself of this misery. How? First of all, the despair which sleepless nights breed was dissipated and the curability of the trouble made clear. Then the necessity for varied and congenial work in moderation was insisted on—work alternating with rest and recreation. Especially was he taught HOW TO PREPARE HIMSELF FOR SLEEP. Each must decide for himself what occupation will most soothe and quiet the mind, whether a game of whist or the reading of a comic paper, or a genial conversation with a friend. The sufferer will do well to spend the time preparatory to retiring in some such way. Finally, the patient was induced to practise the art of auto-suggestion. For fifteen minutes or so nightly he talked sleep to himself. The result of all this effort has been that he now enjoys six and sometimes seven hours' refreshing sleep.

The Nazarene and the Mount.

I see my elder brother, the Nazarene, as he stood upon the Mount, opening his soul to the Eternal, and from the Eternal came those vibrationss which fell from his lips in the sentiments contained in the Sermon on the Mount. The seeds thus sown took root, spread and grew, until today they command the admiration, respect and reverence of the entire civilized world.

In the presence of the Eternal, time disappears. So you, too, may stand upon your Mount, and open your soul to the Eternal and receive these same vibrations.

Thus do, and your soul will be filled with joy, peace, good will and harmony forever.

Remarkable Evidence of Spirit Power and Influence

A Woman's Vision Enables Her to Secure a Divorce.

When Judge Williard M. McEwen entered the final decree in the divorce suit of Matilda Peterson against Edward Peterson recently in the Superior court one of the most peculiar cases of psychic power ever revealed in Cook County came to light.

Although the divorce was obtained upon purely statutory grounds, it developed in the trial of the cause that Mrs. Peterson had been led to believe in her husband's wrongdoing entirely through her dreams, that on three occasions her subsequent investigations had proven conclusively that her dreams were well founded, and that her husband was so thoroughly aware of the powers possessed by his wife that he made no effort to deny the facts that had been so clearly revealed to her.

It is said to be the first time such a case has ever been recorded in Cook County. The appearance of Mrs. Peterson on the witness stand and the impression made by her upon judge, attorneys, and spectations was such that all are absolutely convinced that the woman possesses psychic powers to such an extent that they are almost unexplainable.

Mrs. Peterson lives at 682 Mildred avenue, far out on the Northwest Side, with her four children. She is not an imaginative woman, has lived the life of a typical housewife, and has never attempted to make any use of her powers other than to heed their warning as they came along usually in the trivial affairs of everyday life. The only time that she has allowed them to influence her in the material affairs of her existence was when they showed her conclusively that her husband had fallen under the influence of other women, which led to the divorce referred to.

The powers of Mrs. Peterson have long been known to her circle of friends and acquaintances. They are accepted as a matter of fact, and when she announces that a certain thing will occur, or a certain thing which she possessed no knowledge of did occur, her associates do not think of questioning the accuracy of her statement, any more than her husband did when she described to him the specific nature of his wrongdoing. Mrs. Peterson is a woman of 35 years or thereabouts, has lived all her life in Chicago, and her existence has been the same as that of thousands of other women in moderate circumstances. Had it not been for the peculiar power she possesses it is probable that there would have been no interruption to her married life, for she says she never had any suspicion of the actions of her husband. But when his conduct was revealed to her in her dreams she was so thoroughly aware of their accuracy impressed upon her by years of long experience that she never hesitated in her course.

"How did you first learn of your husband's wrongdoing?" was asked her in court.

"I dreamed it," was her reply.

This is the keynote of the character of this remarkable woman. Her mother before her had possessed the same power, consequently when, years ago, little things began to be revealed to her in this same manner she never had any idea of rejecting them. It became second nature to her to heed what came to her from this source, and gradually, little by little, her friends began to regard her with awe and respect. But never did it occur to her to make any use of this peculiar gift or faculty.

It was with some difficulty that she could be induced to talk of her gift. Not being imaginative, it had never occurred to Mrs. Peterson that it could be of any interest outside the little circle of friends and associates who call at her modest home on Mildred avenue.

"When did I first become aware that I could see things ahead, or events that had happened?" said Mrs. Peterson. It was early in the morning and she had barely finished her preliminary housework.

"I always knew I had that power," she continued, "and it is hard to say when I first realized it. My mother had it before me, although perhaps not in such a marked degree. It probably first manifested itself a good many years ago, when I found myself able to foresee little things pertaining to household affairs. They didn't amount to much, but the habit grew upon me never to doubt what I was convinced would happen, whether my conviction arose from a dream or what will sometimes come to a person when in a subconscious state.

"I soon found myself thinking a great deal, putting in a good deal of time with my thoughts upon matters which interested me, my friends, my relatives, and the affairs which come up in everyday life. I would get into one of these spells when I could see things as clearly as day, and those who were with me would say that I conversed about them, but of the conversations I could never remember anything. But as to the events themselves which I was talking about, I would always retain a most vivid impression. When I had dreamed of anything which had occurred it never occurred to me to doubt it. I would immediately inquire concerning it, and I would find that it had transpired exactly as I had seen it. My friends who knew me were all aware of my power, and nothing that I did in this line would surprise them. Probably the first time that I made use of this power to any extent was eight or nine years ago, when I first had trouble with my husband. I had never the slightest suspicion that anything was wrong, but the moment that I awoke that morning I knew as well what had occurred as though I had seen it myself. Before the day was over both my husband and the other person involved had admitted that what I had seen was true.

"In a hundred instances I have had the same thing occur to me; that is, about trivial matters. Shortly after that I had another experience of the same kind. We were keeping a little store on the North Side and I had a bedroom in the rear. The store was in front. It seems that my husband was discussing this trouble with his brother, but knowing that I would know everything that was said between them in the store, when his brother came that night neither of them said a word. I was lying in the bedroom asleep, or in a trance, as they have called it. The object of his brother's call was to make some sort of an appointment with my husband, but so cautious were they that he merely wrote down the place of the appointment on a piece of paper, held it for his brother to read, and then thrust it into the stove.

"At the identical moment that this was done I stirred uneasily and got up. The room was dark, but I knew exactly what had happened. I went at once into the store. The two men were there, exactly as I had seen them. 'I want that note,' I said. 'I haven't got it,' replied my husband. I went to the stove and took it out. This instance and many others being known to my husband, he was thoroughly aware that I would be likely to know anything that he wanted in. But I am not referring particularly to the matter of the divorce proceedings. I do not know whether one is fortunate or not to possess such a faculty. Certainly I have never thought of turning it to any account. Indeed I do not know whether I could figure out anything that is likely to transpire if I were to try to throw myself into one of these trances or not. I have never tried it."

"The most striking thing that I remember concerning Mrs. Petterson," said a young man who has lived with the family for some time, "took place a number of months ago. Mrs. Peterson remembers the circumstance, but not so vividly as I do. At that time she had been ill, and I remember on the night in question her husband and I were sitting in the back bedroom, some thirty feet from the front room, where Mrs. Peterson lay in an unconscious state. She had had perfect possession of her faculties before that, and had simply gotten into one of her trances. But we did not know it. We talked the matter over and Mr. Peterson came to the conclusion that she ought to be sent to the hospital the next day. Just at that moment we heard a noise from the front room. Both of us hastened in there and found Mrs. Peterson talking in her sleep.

"'I don't want that man in the white apron to come near, nor that woman either,' she was saying, and then she went on and talked about the hospital surroundings, the table she was lying on, the attendants, the nurses, and the rest of paraphernalia. She did without having the slightest inkling that we had been talking of sending her there. She also repeated some of the things we had said. When she came to she looked up at us and said, 'I've got back home again, haven't I?'

"The night before the suit against her husband came to trial she was in the front room, also in a semi-conscious state. Her husband was naturally uneasy as to what was to come up and asked me a few questions regarding it. We were in the back room of the house and talking in an undertone. I was saying a few things as to what was to come out, when just then she came out in one of her subconscious states. 'You have been giving away my case,' she said, 'and it must stop.' Of course, I had said nothing which could in any way affect the case, but we talked no more that evening."

"When you go through an experience of this kind does it leave any after effect upon you?" Mrs. Peterson was asked.

"I am exceedingly weak and lethargic," she said, "as though I had lost a night's sleep. It is very seldom that I remember anything I say in a trance, and I am generally surprised when I learn what I have said. But, as I remarked before, I have very vivid recollections of the events that transpired or what I foresaw. I am not always in a trance, either, when I see things that are occurring. Some time ago my mother was in a hospital, and I knew, of course, that she has been subject to trances of this kind. One afternoon I was in my kitchen, when I could see before me as vividly as though I had been there myself, my mother in one of those moods, and the attendants at the hospital unable to do anything with her. I immediately put on my things an went to the hospital and was denied admittance, as I was told that it was not the proper time. 'But my mother is ill and you are not able to do anything with her,' I said. The hospital attendants were absolutely amazed, but admitted that it was so, and finally I was allowed to go in. I found my mother exactly as I had seen her, but a few words from me quieted her down. There is no time when I am in the house here at night, asleep or otherwise, and anyone comes in, no matter how quietly, but that I know it. It is not that I hear them myself; I just know that some one has come in. Uncanny? Yes, I presume it would be for those who are not used to it and it has never done me any harm."

Mrs. Peterson stopped and sat quietly a few moments.

"No, I do not think I ever care to attempt to make any practical use of this faculty," she said, quietly. "I have my four children, have enough to keep me busy at home, why should I?"

THE ESSENIC ASSEMBLY.

A Fraternal, Co-Operative, Educational Association for Thinking Men and Women.

The West sends a message to the independent and progressive thinkers of the world: "Come together in the fraternal association that will enable each to express the highest truth that is in him or her."

For more than half a century those who have dared to think outside the trammels of ancient thought have become more and more split up into factions until to-day there is in the United States and the other civilized countries of the world an almost innumerable host of little groups and knots of people professing varying shades of thought, recognized as unorthodox in religion and philosophy.

In San Francisco here has been formed an association known as the Essenic Assembly, which has for its purpose the bringing together of advocates of various shades of progressive thought, and already a hearty endorsement of the movement is coming from all parts of the country.

The Essenic Assembly is a secret order, having three degrees, believed to be built on an enduring foundation of justice and equity, and holding as a fundamental truth, that woman equals man.

It seeks to encourage the study of science, philosophy, history, economics and essential religious truths; it encourages co-operation on lines best applicable to economic production, and equitable distribution of the products and earning of labor and capital; and aims to promote all endeavors to better the social, ethical and industrial condition of the human race.

Like other fraternal orders, it grants sick, funeral benefits, and life insurance, but does not engage in industrial business as an association. In this regard it encourages, assists and promotes by teaching fundamental principles of co-operation, by building character, without which no co-operation can succeed, and by furnishing plans for, and supervision of, co-operative industries organized under its direction.

It encourages the study of essential religious truths, but leaves to its members all latitude of opinion as to what are such truths. Upon its platform, the Theosophist, Spiritualist, Christian Scientist and Monist may stand side by side in fraternal organization without either losing any TRUTH that is peculiar to his philosophy, but more secure in a broader fraternity.

While the Essenic Assembly is an accomplished fact, and as such appeals to the thinkers of the world for support, it is not a completed fact. It is handed over to the thinkers as a trust to be used by all students of the higher truth, in faith that they will shape it to the highest ends.

While it holds to the brotherhood of man,—the oneness of all life, and the perfectability and responsibility of the soul as fundamental truths, it leaves to each to make his own deduction therefrom, and to build thereon such a philosophy as best satisfies his conception of ultimate truth. Within its portals ALL are equal. In a word, while it encourages the study of religion, it is not dogmatic in the expression thereof.

On the other hand it encourages the study of history and economics, but is not in its action political. It seeks to educate the individual for useful citizenship.

Thinking people have felt the need of such a society for many years, and now that it is theirs by association therewith, will they avail themselves of it? Those who desire to know more about the ESSENIC ASSEMBLY CAN PROCURE FURTHER INFORMATION BY ADDRESSING THE SECRETARY,

A LESSON FROM NATURE.

(This poem is an account of the last days of Robert L. Stevenson, given through my hand.—Mrs. Nora Armstrong.)

There's an island far out in the ocean
I dreamed of one night in my sleep,
Where the blue waves forever are rolling
Along on the beautiful beach.

And one day I sailed from the main land
Far out to that beautiful isle,
Where the sun kissed the waves in the morning
And faded at night with a smile.

Like the bidding adieu of a lover
Whose absence would last but an hour,
Then return with a bright smile of greeting
With all of love's magical power.

And out on that island of beauty
I made me a home on its breast;
And I thought that of all God's kingdom
This isle was the fairest and best.

And there I lived hours in the sunshine,
Watching the waves on the beach,
Knowing that every bright ripple
Some precious lesson could teach

And I prayed that some power from heaven
Would teach me to read as I run,
And write down some lesson from Nature
I learned from the waves and the sun.

And there on that beautiful island,
Far out from the dark haunts of men,
I learned to commune with the angels
And write down their words with my pen.

And the world knows well the story
Of Robert Louis Stevenson,
Who lived far out in the ocean
And an author's laurels won.

Who longed ofttimes in the twilight,
In his own native birth-place to be,
Yet could not remain in the body,
Except on that isle in the sea.

So health that one ever is seeking,
If he has not that jewel of his own,
Led me out to that beautiful island
Away from my own native home.

And there in the sound of the billows
When earth life was ebbing away,
I saw a bright vision of heaven,
And heard all the songs that they play.

And their notes were the same as the robin,
Caught up from the musical spheres.
And rolled out upon life's broad billows
Throughout all eternity's years.

And I asked of the angels in heaven,
If they had any lesson for me,
That I could not glean out of the sunbeams
And out of the waves of the sea.

And they answered; Just Nature's our teacher,
No matter how high you may go,
It's the same that teaches the robin,
And no other the Archangels know.

LETTER FROM PARIS.

A Striking Sign of the Times in Relation to Spiritualism.

It is a sign of the times to see leading Paris papers giving two-column articles to the subject of Spiritualism. This has been particularly noticeable since the publication of the "Echo of the Marvelous," which appears fortnightly, and gives a great many interesting accounts of phenomena. The editor, who is orthodox, gave a lecture here recently where he admitted that these phenomena were all true, then concluded by attributing it all to the devil—as usual.

The Matin, which is an independent paper, opens its columns to such writers as Lombroso, Morelli, Flammarion, etc., as well as their opponents. Bishop Bolo replies to L'Abbe Loisy. Ideas and thoughts are put before the public, and one of the latest is the offer of five hundred francs (one hundred dollars) to any medium who will cause an object to remove from one point to another, a few inches distant. This is to be done under test conditions, permitting to photograph the object in space, and without contact with anything material." This proposition comes from M. Gustave Le Bon, a well-known writer here, who, if not convinced himself, deserves the good will of Spiritualists, in his effort to call attention to the subject in his long articles. M. Le Bon is convinced that he will not have to pay his prize, for "the thing can't be done," and he seems to think that all those who attest having witnessed similar phenomena were simply hallucinated, and he appeals to the phenomena of the kind in India as proof of his hallucination explanation.

I am inclined to imagine that the Le Bon challenge is largely to the address of Dr. Sarak, or the "fakir," as they call him here. Dr. Sarak is the man who pretends to be able to make a grain of wheat grow in a few minutes, and to bring little fishes into existence from nothing—by an effort of the will. He went before the Matin and performed—but although the fishes came all right, it was not made clear by what route they arrived, and there was talk about a certain rubber tube, which one lady pretended to have seen under the theosophist's robe of the "Master." Be that as it may, people will now say, "Why don't he go and take the prize, having consented to do his wonders before the Matin?" But the Adept of the Mahaatmas is very busy just now with "esotherical review," and the "savant" will probably have to wait for another medium in order to establish the 'scientific basis" of this order of phenomena.

M. Le Bon concludes that if the prize is not won soon, it will prove that it cannot be done, and therefore, has never occurred.

In this same daily paper we read an account by an anonymous writer who says he used to be a very smart athletic sportsman. One evening he assisted at a seance with Mr. Home, who, it appears, told him he did not expect to get much with him. A little later, feeling something rub against his leg, under the table, he "grabbed" as quick as lightning and found he held a bare foot belonging to Mr. Home, who looked at him sadly and said in a melancholy voice, "I told you so." Our story teller does not say when, where and with whom the sad event happened, but he does let us infer that such was Home—and there the end of phenomena.

Citing again the Matin, we find an eloquent article by Leon Denis, a writer of real talent, on the death of Me. Noeggerath, who was well known among the Spiritualists of Europe as an author of works on Spiritualism. She was beloved by all who met her, and for forty years has been untiring in spreading about her truths of Spiritualism, and these truths, treated as ridiculous by some, will triumph in the end, says Leon Denis, "because they are based on experimental science, the highest philosophy and the purest morality."

As I close this, I read in this morning's Matin that the prize for the moving of an object without visible and physical contact has been raised to four hundred dollars (2,000 francs).

The Biggest Saloon Keeper and Liquor Seller.

The biggest saloonkeeper and liquor seller in the world is the czar of Russia. He is proprietor of all the saloons in his vast domain, and thus owns the biggest trust on earth, with competition totally barred, and with profits increasing enormously every year. The great white czar's government encouraged drink to such a degree last year that the income derived from the sale of vodka exceeded $390,000,000. Every year the Russian peasants and workmen are said to get drunker, dirtier, more miserable, and more brutal. The imperial grog shops are small and unclean, with a counter at one end and rows of bottles of various sizes all around the walls from floor to ceiling. The people are not allowed to drink on the premises, so they go to the doorstep, break off the neck of their bottle and after swallowing their contents, fling it into the street. The bottle holds about a wineglassful of the imperial drug and costs 5 cents. The daily wage of a workman in the fields is from 10 to 15 cents. Tchelyseff is a member of the third douma who declared drink kills Russia and that neither a constitution nor a revolution are so much needed as temperance. He says that the government budget is made up of poison.

HOW ITOOK MY WRINKLES OUT

After Facial Massage, Creams and Beauty Doctors Had Failed.

BY HARRIETT META.

Trouble, worry and ill health brought me deep lines and wrinkles. I realized that they not only greatly marred my appearance and made me look much older, but that they would greatly interfere with my success, either socially or financially, depends very largely on her appearance. The homely woman with deep lines and furrows in her face, must fight an unequal battle with her younger and better looking sister.

I therefore bought various brands of cold cream and skin foods and massaged my face with most constant regularity, hoping to regain my former appearance. But the wrinkles simply would not go. On the contrary they seemed to get deeper. Next I went to a beauty specialist, who told me she could easily rid me of my wrinkles. I paid my money and took the treatment. Sometimes I thought they got less, but after spending all the money I could afford for such treatment I found I still had my wrinkles. So I gave up in despair and concluded I must carry them to my grave. One day a friend of mine who was versed in chemistry, made a suggestion, and this gave me a new idea. I immediately went to work making experiments and studying everything I could get hold of on the subject. After several long months of the most numberless trials and discouragements, I finally discovered a process which produced most astounding results on my wrinkles in a single night. I was delighted beyond expression. I tried my treatment again, and, lo, and behold, my wrinkles were practically gone. A third treatment—three nights in all—and I had no wrinkles and my face was as smooth as ever. I next offered my treatment to some of my immediate friends, who used it with surprising results, and I have now decided to offer it to the public.

Miss Gladys Desmond of Pittsburg, Pa., writes, that it made her wrinkles disappear in one night. Mrs. M. W. Graves of Bridgeport, Conn. states: "There is not a wrinkle left, my friends say I look 20 years younger. I consider your treatment a Godsend to womankind." Mrs. James Barse of Central City, S. D., writes: "The change is so great that it seems more a work of magic."

I will send further particulars to anyone who is interested, absolutely free of charge. I use no cream, facial massage, face steamings or so-called skin food; there is nothing to inject and nothing to injure the skin. It is an entirely new discovery of my own, and so simple that you can use it without the knowledge of your most intimate friends. You apply the treatment at night and go to bed. In the morning, lo! the wonderful transformation. People often write me it sounds too good to be true. Well, the test will tell. If interested in my discovery please address Harriett Meta, Suit 2906, Syracuse, N. Y., and I will send full particulars.

It will write in full sight—yes, in full sight and it will write more, write better, write easier and keep on doing so longer than any other typewriter.

AN ENTIRELY NEW DEAL.

The POSTAGE on papers has been increased to all the British possessions on this continent. On a single paper we are compelled to pay ONE CENT each week, amounting to 52 cents a year, whereas previously we only paid the pound rates—a mere trifle. Hence, to all the British possessions on this continent the paper hereafter will be $1.50 per year.

Practically Dead.

Now the statement of a Catholic ecclesiastic in the public press:

"The church in France is dead, and beyond the hope of resurrection."

He adds:

"True believers form only a very trifling minority in the nation to-day. The church is practically dead and will never come to life again."

But this is not all. We quote farther:

"It can be said without fear of contradiction, that the radical and socialist press have induced two-thirds, yes, and perhaps three-fourths of the French Catholics to dissolve their connection with the church. * * * The women form the majority of Christian believers; yet even these female believers make up a minority of the total number of French women."

Our quotations are from the Literary Digest of New York, and are perfectly trustworthy.

Italy, as all reports agree in stating, the home of Catholicism, and where most of its literature was forged, and where the Inquisition put in its most deadly work, and contributed most of the Popes, Cardinals and Prelates, is declared honeycombed with Liberalism.

And Spain, good old Spain—that gave the world its Torquemada, and its Ximenes, and contributed so largely to the destruction of the world's choicest literature, and the wreckage of aboriginal civilization in America, is halting in its missionary work, and seems destined to join its neighbors on the north and east in crushing the great power which by usurpation, destroyed the earlier civilization and literature of the world, culminating in producing a thousand years, known as the Dark Ages, which were only illuminated by fagots and flames, while burning heretics and thinkers.

The hope of Catholicism is in America. It is bending all her great powers to colonize this country. She is unwilling her children shall be taught in our common schools; so under the false and specious claim of teaching morals she is educating her youth to hate our free institutions; while demagogue politicians, to gain Catholic votes, are catering to her prejudices.

It is well. It is here, on American soil, and under our glorious skies, where real freedom first dawned, and it is here ecclesiastical tyranny shall meet its Waterloo, and go out forever. The sons of those who gave us a constitutional government, and who crushed chattel slavery can be trusted to crush priestly usurpation and ecclesiastical slavery when the time comes for action.

A Fact and a Challenge.

The following is from the pen of that distinguished and voluminous English author, Thomas Inman, M.D., best known to American readers as author of "Ancient Faiths Embodied in Ancient Names," from which the extract. We quote:

"When we observe the accordance and harmony between ancient and modern myths and mysteries, we readily perceive how little originality our modern faith contains; for THERE IS NOT A RITE, CEREMONY OR BELIEF WE NOW PROFESS THAT CANNOT BE TRACED TO ITS ORIGIN IN CHALDEAN IDOLATRY—IN ASSYRIAN, EGYPTIAN OR ROMAN MYTHOLOGY."

And, aside from persecution for opinion's sake and methods to compel belief in Jesus as a God, The Progressive Thinker challenges the entire orthodox world to prove to the contrary.

She Hears a Spirit Voice.

Grand Rapids, Mich.—"You can walk. You can walk."

This was the strange whisper little Elizabeth Klyn, for four years a cripple, heard a few nights ago as she lay in her bed. And when she heard this voice of the night she jumped out of bed and did walk. She ran into her mother's room completely cured.

Four years ago Elizabeth Klyn suffered a nervous shock that confined her to a hospital. She was discharged by the doctors as incurable, a cripple for life. Her mother, Mrs. F. J. Klyn, 10 Antisdel street, never believed her daughter's affliction incurable, and she impressed continually on the child's mind the idea that some day somehow she would recover.

Now she romps and plays with just as much freedom as any of her friends.

Fiction Eliminated What Remains.

If fiction were wholly eliminated from the domain of literature how little of real history would remain! Ascend the stream of time as high as we may, and search its records with greatest care, and very little will be recognized as scientific truth.

They who receive the Bible as an unerring guide, meet in its first chapter an account of creation, a story all science repudiates. Scarcely a statement—probably not one, would be the result of investigation. The very first verse, states "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth." If there was no beginning, as science now teaches, then that postulate is false as is every other in the narration.

The story of Abel and Cain, like the process of making the first pair, was a priestly fiction with no foundation in truth. Then the tailor God, making clothes to cover the nakedness of the first pair, is a silly invention of ignorance.

The flood story with the Lord opening the windows of heaven, flooding the whole earth, covering all the mountains, and destroying all life, may have been based on a flood in the valley of the Euphrates, where the story was first written. Certain it is no such deluge ever occurred, or can occur on this globe for want of water.

No traces of the Jews as a people ever residing as slaves in Egypt are found. Bricks made with straw, quoted as evidence, is simply moonshine merely. All bricks, only sun-burned, were thus made, in Egypt, and the representation that the Jews were required to cut stubble to supply the straw furnishes no proof that a Jew was ever in Egypt.

The mode of the escape of these slaves from Egyptian bondage and their passage through the walled up waters of the Red Sea, would do to tell to a barbarian people, destitute of the simplest principles of natural philosophy, and the recital should have been suppressed before this age of science dawned on the world.

And the same may be said about Joshua's successful prayer, not to the Lord, but to the Sun: "And he said in the sight of Israel: 'SUN, stand thou still upon Gibeon, and thou, Moon, in the valley of Ajalon.' * * * So the sun stood still in the midst of heaven, and hasted not to go down about a whole day."—Josh. 10:12.

During that day's slaughter the cities of Makkedah, and Libnah, and Lachish, and Gezer, and Eglon, and Debir, as also Hebron, were destroyed, and the inhabitants were "smote with the edge of the sword, and utterly destroyed all the souls therein, and left none remaining; but he utterly destroyed all that breathed, as the Lord God of Israel had commanded."

Churchmen are welcome to accept this Bible history as inerrant facts, and believe the "Lord God" thus commanded, if they will; but they must permit us to believe it a gross misrepresentation, and a blasphemous falsehood dishonoring Infinite Wisdom.

There is as much truth in the above story as there is in the wonderful strength of Samson, which came from his Nazarine habit of wearing long hair; of Jonah spending three days in a whale's belly, all that time deprived of air, and coming out alive; of Daniel's adventure in a lion's den; of the three unhurt in a fiery furnace;; of a Jewish virgin giving birth to a God, and miracles wherein the writers were striving to excel the marvels told of other demi-gods. All these wonders, whether related of Jesus, of Buddha, Crishna, Hercules or others, should be relegated to the domain of myth.

Still on the Decline.

Now the announcement that the Italian government is distinctly unfriendly to Catholicism, with probability that in the near future there will be a repetition in Italy of conditions now prevailing in France. It is evidently because of this the most worthless, and the criminal class at that, from Popedom, is now colonizing America. Repressive legislation is needed by Congress to stay this torrent of "undesirable citizens" that are being dumped on this country.

Custom Not Christian Alone.

The giving of eggs at Easter is derived from the old nature worship, and is not confined to the Christian nations. The Parsees of Persia and India distribute eggs at the opening of spring, and in many other nations the giving of eggs at the commencement of spring is as common as New Year's gifts with us. In Hungary the boys sprinkle the girls with rose water and receive eggs in return.

A Model Prayer.

Here is an accurate translation of a prayer, by Cleanthus, the Stoic philosopher, to Jupiter, the father of the gods. Cleanthus died in his ninetieth year, B. C. 240. The Roman senate erected a statue to his memory. Hear him:

"Hail, Great King and Father of Gods and men! Thou who hast many names but who art one, sole, omnipotent virtue, Jupiter, author of nature, who governs all things by thy wisdom! allow mortals to call upon thee, for all things that exist are thy offspring, images of thy being, echoes of thy eternal voice. I will sing to thee, and exalt thy power without end. The whole universe moves by thy influence. The infinite variety of souls that inhabits the earth, sea, and the ethereal spheres are subject to thy wise control. The lightnings are thy ministers. They flash from thy powerful hand, and all nature trembles. Thus, thunder-armed thou guidest creation by unerring law, and through the present admixture of evil thou guidest all to good. Thou curbest all excesses, and wilt cause all confusion to result in universal and eternal order. Unhappy are mortals ignorant of thy law, which, if they obeyed it would lead them into a virtuous and happy life. In blind frenzy they stray from the chief good, tempted by thirst of glory, or shameless avarice, or voluptuous pleasures. But, O Great Jupiter, giver of all good, who dwellest with lightnings in the clouds of heaven, save mankind from these dreadful errors! Remove all shadows from our minds, and enable us to understand thy pure and righteous laws. Thus honored with a knowledge of thee, we shall be fitted to return the gift in praises of thy mighty works; and neither mortal nor immortal beings can be more blest than in singing praises to thy immutable, universal law with everlasting hymns."

How much have the Christians in over two thousand years of added time improved on that old Pagan prayer?

Pulpit Thievery.

Rev. Dr. Barton, in a recent issue of The Advance, of this city, exposing the plagiarizing of the clergy, quotes a letter he says he received from a domine on the Pacific coast, that has real merit, and betrays how brilliant pulpit orators are sometimes made, oftener than is generally supposed. We quote from the declaration of pious quid nuncs, from The Advance:

"Two years ago, when earthquakes and fire made San Francisco a ruin, the Brooklyn Eagle published two pages of sermons which had been preached about the great calamity. Several of these sermons showed their leading ideas and even phrasing to have been taken from sermons preacher by Beecher and Talmage on the Chicago fire of 1871. But, strangest of all, this paper had a special from Oakland, Cal., reporting a sermon by a leading Methodist of that place, which was an eloquent description of the earthquake and fire and the lessons to be drawn from them. Now, this sermon, telegraphed across the continent, was pieced together almost bodily from sermons of Beecher and Talmage, especially from Beecher's sermon, down even to the last final appeal for help for the sufferers! These sermons and the plagiarized ones are open before me as I write, and I have just compared them. I prepared a sermon on this same calamity, and was drawing on Beecher and Talmage when The Eagle arrived containing the sermons of the metropolitan divines. What was my surprise to find they had been stealing from the same sources I was using! I then added their productions to those of Beecher and Talmage, and stole some from both of them, but hardly so much as one of them had stolen from Beecher alone! If such things are done by the city preachers what may be done by the beginners in the remote rural districts?"

Sensible Advice.

Bishop Kidder, many years ago, in instructing missionaries to Mohammedans how to act and teach, said, among other good things:

"Avoid teaching doctrines against common sense. The Mohammedans are not fools to be gained in that way. The doctrine of transubstantiation is a great stumbling block to them, and the church which teacheth it is very unfit to win those people over. Avoid weak arguments; for Mohammedans are not to be converted by hard words. Use them with humanity. It is certain many Christians have used arguments that have no force, and advanced propositions that are void of truth. We lose ground when we do this, and injure our cause."

If Christian missionaries are prohibited from teaching doctrines against common sense, "they must cease to teach the virgin birth of their junior God, as well the conversion by prayer of bread and wine into the body and blood of that virgin born God. It is inculcating a lie to represent such a transformation is made. And if it were possible to make it a fact, the consumption of that body and blood would be cannibalism. Every orthodox creed teaching that three persons in the Godhead make but one God, is a mathematical lie, as gross when taught an American as when taught a Turk

TOLSTOI DESCRIBES DEATH.

Says It Is the True Awakening from a Dream.—Depicts Different Ages.—In Dying He Expects Happiness and World More Real.

"I know with certainty that in dying I shall be happy and that I shall enter a world more real."

Count Tolstoi thus sums up his anticipations of death in a reply to a friend who congratulated him upon his approaching eightieth birthday. All earthly life, he says, is a dream and death is the true awakening. He awaits that awakening with happiness. Elaborating on this idea he says:

"In our earthly life one dreams of another and more real life, and in that other life dream of yet another, and so on ad infinitum even to the last life, the life of God."

Of death at different ages and under different circumstances he says:

"Death in youth is as when man is awakened before he has slept his full measure.

"Death in old age is as when a man awakes of his own accord after a good sleep.

"Suicide is as a nightmare which man banishes by remembering that he is asleep. He makes an effort and wakes.

A REPLY TO THE OLD POPE.

There is Some Vigorous Kicking Against Him in His Own Ranks.—Father Tyrrell Gives His Opinion on Modernism.—Says That the Encyclical is Likely to Have the Effect of Driving Modernism Underground, Where It Will Grow, Strengthen, and Organize Itself.

The Waterford Leader says:

Whether the Pope's encyclical will in the least affect the vitality of Modernism or only cause it temporarily to veil its face is the query put by one of the foremost of the Modernists. The Rev. Father George Tyrrell has written a long letter to the London Times in which the latter alternative is prophesied as the only possible negative effect the papal action can have. The boldness of his utterance is reported to have caused consternation in Vatican circles, one high personage (says a dispatch to the New York Times) declaring that the church can hardly do less than expel him His letter, filling over four columns of the London Times, gives a detailed examination of both the controversial part of the encyclical and the practical part, with the consequences its enforcement would entail. It practically comes the nearest to what may be regarded as the official utterance of Modernism, and as such is interesting to people of all shades of belief. Father Tyrrell proceeds in words like these, to estimate the effect which the encyclical may be expected to produce:

"Should the repressive measures of the encyclical be successfully carried out, which is rather difficult to imagine, it is to be feared that Modernism, to whose astounding energy, versatility, and diffusion the encyclical bears reluctant testimony, will be simply driven underground to the catacombs, there to grow and strengthen and organize itself against the not distant day when it shall be able to break forth again with gathered impetus. In spite of sand-barriers the tide will come in—not peacebly, but with a dangerous rush. It took two centuries to kill Jansenism, whose roots were far fewer and feebler than those of Modernism, and whose direction was against, rather than with, that of advancing civilization. If the Pope makes, or seems to make, martyrs and confessors, he may only drive the right wing of Modernism into closer sympathy with the left, and win for the whole compact body the admiration and moral support, not only of the outside world, but also of multitudes of Catholics who, however indifferent or antipathetic to Modernism, are modern enough to dislike any appearance of moral violence and intolerance, and, still more, any attempt to ascribe intellectual errors to bad faith and to evil motives of which God alone is judge.

The encyclical plainly desires to enlist the sympathies of other religious bodies in its condemnation of Modernists, insisting over and over again that their principles are subversive of all religion indiscriminately. But for this end it identifies Catholicism far too closely with scholasticism and makes it too plain that it recognizes no logical alternative between extreme ultramontanism and rank atheism. Protestants will see clearly enough what they might expect from a 'restitution of all things' according to the mind of the encyclical; nor will they care to embark all their religious treasures in so frail a skiff as is furnished them by an obsolete science system.

"The harsh intellectualism, the almost fierce antagonism to all inward religious experience and union with God which pervades the document, will probably alienate the sympathies of multitudes who, in spite of a hundred repugnances, are continually drawn toward the Catholic church as the mother of saints and mystics and who see in mysticism that firm basis of religion which no logic, no 'argument from motion,' can ever supply. And, as devout souls will be shocked, so cultivated minds will be revolted by a blow struck, not merely against the Modernists of to-day, but, in principle, against their spiritual ancestry—against those names in the past, to which Catholics most readily appeal in proof of their church's contribution to enlightenment and progress."

A Fond Request.

Mrs. Harper, known as a good medium, is ill in the hospital, and some of our good mediums are holding circles for her benefit. It is a special request of the writer hereof, that others do likewise. All mediums are familiar with Mrs. Harper, and it is enough to say she was actively engaged in the work when she fell ill. It is a good time to do a humanitarian act. Send your special collections to Miss Eugenia Roubie, 567 E. 62nd street, and as Secretary of the State Association she will see that it is properly turned over to Mrs. Harper. DR. T. WILKINS,

THE DIVINE PLAN.

As Comprehensively Set Forth by Dr. A. Pearson, of Ponca, Okla., in a Communication Wherein He Expresses His High Appreciation of the Great Benefit He Has Derived From Reading The Progressive Thinker.

To the Editor: Yours of recent date, informing me of your kindness in rewarding me for my little efforts in securing subscribers for The Progressive Thinker, is surely appreciated, but for reasons, perhaps not clearly known to you I most respectfully decline to accept your kindness.

In the first place, I do not allow any one, not even the editor of The Progressive Thinker, the best educational paper on earth, to outdo me in generosity; and again if I should accept your kind offer of reward, it would appear to me that your DIVINE PLAN, by my abuse, would become a "divine fake," if such a thing could be possible, for have I not during these many years received from your generous hand tenfold more than what I have paid for, in the way of a splendid library of books, that I can only look upon as a pure gift, according to the DIVINE PLAN instituted upon the unselfish desire to uplift and advance ignorant humanity.

Again, I am fully convinced of the fact that all the knowledge I possess to-day and the good I have been able to extend to less favored human beings, by newly discovered healing processes, are all traceable to The Progressive Thinker. If The Progressive Thinker had never existed, or had never reached my thinking apparatus, I would of course existed like others in ignorance and self-conceit, hence The Progressive Thinker, true to its name, is responsible for my advancement towards knowledge and wisdom.

A year ago we had a regular old style Methodist experience meeting at the camp in Winfield, Kansas, when each one gave testimony as to the original cause of their convension to Spiritualism. This conference meeting was conducted by Brother Erwood, the intellectual spiritual warhorse, whom I at one time accused of having formerly been a Methodist preacher, by reason of his general make-up and insatiate proclivities for the feathered barnyard product, and his spontaneous mode of expression, but gladly received his personal denial of the charge! And when it came to my turn to testify to the glorious power of salvation, I truly remarked that The Progressive Thinker had originally pointed out to me the way of salvation leading to knowledge, the true Savior of the world, hence how can I do otherwise than recommend The Progressive Thinker to those that earnestly seek for salvation from ignorance, superstition and false beliefs.

And at last I come to the most important result traceable to the DIVINE PLAN of The Progressive Thinker whose illuminating teachings along evolutionary lines of expansion ultimately resulted in the production of three volumes entitled: PSYCHO-HARMONIAL PHILOSOPHY; PSYCHO-HARMONIAL THERAPY, and THE LOST CHORD AND LOST WORD REVEALED, which are now ready, and will go to the press in a few weeks, and the good that may come from this work becomes the glorious crown befitting the DIVINE PLAN of The Progressive Thinker.

With all this clearly before my mental vision, could you expect me to accept a pecuniary reward for my feeble efforts in partly repaying a debt that cannot be liquidated in dollars and cents, hence in justice to the Divine Plan you will at once please re-charge me what you had no authority to credit me; yet in view of all this, favors of a different nature will be duly appreciated and accepted when focused to be in perfect harmony with the DIVINE PLAN as exemplified in the reciprocal compensation obtaining in all the various realms in nature.

I WILL.

I will start anew this morning with a higher, fairer creed;
I will cease to stand complaining of my ruthless neighbor's greed;
I will cease to sit repining while my duty's call is clear,
I will waste no moment whining and my heart shall know no fear.

I will look sometimes about me for the things that merit praise;
I will search for hidden beauties that elude the grumbler's gaze;
I will try to find contentment in the paths that I must tread,
I will cease to have resentment when another moves ahead.

I will not be swayed by envy when my rival's strength is shown;
I will not deny his merit, but I'll strive to prove my own;
I will try to see the beauty spread before me, rain or shine—
I will cease to preach your duty and be more concerned with mine.

DEAD PAINTER'S VOICE INSPIRES "DREAM PICTURES."

Spirit Instructions Direct Artist in Work That Has Stirred Art Circles and Excited Investigation by Medium.

New York, April 27.—Painting "dream pictures" after working for thirteen years in various factories as a jeweler is the result of neither tuition not technique, according to Frederic Thompson. He declares it is inspired by the spirit voice of his artist friend, R. Swain Gifford, commanding him to leave the jewelry business, and follow art.

The phenomenon has set the art world looking to its laurels and has stirred the American Institute of Psychical Research.

When seen yesterday Mr. Thompson willingly showed the efforts of his "dream-inspired" brain. He explained the visitation of the spirit in the National Art Galleries while he was viewing paintings by his friend.

"I painted because I could not help it, not because I originally wanted to," he said. "The pictures kept coming before me. They interrupted me. While I was working for a large firm in New York I was obliged to handle precious stones of many colors. They shaped themselves into pictures before my eyes.

"The pictures drove me from my work, and my desire to paint became so great that I got materials and started in without instruction.

"Until two years ago I never had held a brush, and I knew no more about colors than what is necessary in designing jewelry. I had known Mr. Gifford slightly, and on one occasion visited his studio to ask him to interest the Tiffany Company in some of my new ideas in designs.

"I remember having admired several of his paintings then. Soon after that Mr. Gifford left town and I did not hear of him again until I went to the National Art Galleries to view some of his work.

"I had no knowledge of his death until then. As I walked from scene to scene in the quiet galleries I was suddenly aroused by a clear, loud voice, saying: "See, this is my work—go on with my work!"

Mr. Thompson paused to slip a gay little marine which was painted off "Tarpaulin Cove" into the frame that lately held a study of a tempest, called "Stormbeaten Trees."

"Following the strange directions, I began painting scenes I thought grew out of my imagination," he continued, "but later they proved to be sketches of well known spots in Martha's Vineyard, and the Elizabeth Islands, where I never had been before and which I found, to my amazement, was Mr. Gifford's sketching ground.

"I immediately went there and found evidences of Mr. Gifford's visits.

"VOICES SANG TO ME AS I PAINTED, AND I HEARD MUSIC AND OTHER SOUNDS. NOW AND THEN I COULD HEAR THE VOICE OF MY SPIRIT INSTRUCTOR, URGING ME TO GO ON IN THE SAME TONES HE HAD USED BEFORE.

"A year ago I gave up my work on the advice of artists, having decided that painting is my vocation. Mr. Hyslop, at the suggestion of Dr. Funk, advised that I visit a medium.

"Although I cannot reconcile myself to this explanation, I lent myself to Dr. Hyslop's directions and sought a medium, who described an artist standing behind my chair. The figure's hand always is pointing to me, as if I were the medium through which his dissatisfied spirit seeks to complete his works.

"Although I cannot account for my sudden impulse to paint, I feel that it is a latent gift that has only developed since I have been old enough to answer its demands."

Professor Hyslop, who has undertaken to investigate the curious phenomena, said yesterday: "I am not prepared to make a statement as yet. I had not thought of Mr. Thompson's ability as an artist. To me just now we must only consider the phenomena under which the works were produced. It remains to be seen whether he will ever 'arrive' or not."—Daily Examiner, Chicago.

Ferdinand Fox Jencken Passed On.

Passed to spirit realms Ferdinand Fox Jencken, son of Catherine Fox Jencken and Henry Diedrich Jencken, a barrister-at-law, London, England. The son, Ferdinand, was born Sept. 19, 1873. He was christened in the Church of England and named Ferdinand Diedrick Lowenstein Jencken. His spirit vacated the physical form April 19, 1908, aged 34 years and 7 months, caused by tuberculosis. The funeral was held at Stephen Merritt's burial parlors, 8th Avenue and 19th Street, New York, April 21, at 8 p. m. Mrs. Mary A. Newton, president of the First Association of Spiritualists, presided. Mrs. Helen T. Brigham and Wm. A. Hale, editor of the Herald of Truth, Boston, delivered the addresses. The Ladies' Aid Society, auxiliary to the First Association, Mrs. George R. Storm, president, and Margaret Gaule Riedinger, treasurer, directly after hearing of his death, bought a plat in the Kensico Cemetery for Indigent Spiritualists, and on Wednesday Mr. Riedinger and myself accompanied the remains to the place of burial, 27 miles on the Harlem division of the New York Central Railroad.

Katie Fox Jencken, mother of Ferdinand, died July 2, 1892, and from that time to the present I have been looking after him as a foster father. The late Abbie Judson gave much valuable assistance for a time; finding he did not make the proper use of her charity at times, she withdrew her support. The late Frederick Mayer, treasurer of the National Spiritualists' Association, gave $20 semi-annually to me per Mary T. Longley, secretary of the N. S. A., as a contribution to his support. Mr. Mayer passed to spirit realms in the spring of 1907 (March, I believe); from that time to October, when the First Association commenced their meetings, I supplied the necessary funds for his maintenance. On my making this state of affairs known to Mrs. M. Gaule Riedinger, she made an earnest appeal to the Aid Society and they at once supplied me with the necessary funds to provide him every reasonable and necessary comfort until his demise and burial. His last letter, April 18, written as an expression of his heartfelt thanks to those who had so generously came to his assistance in the hour of his greatest need, was pathetic. I quote it literally:

"My Dear Mrs. Riedinger and Ladies' Aid, the Angels of Mercy: Mother is by my side and calls me. She tells: Ferdinand, get ready, in a short time I will call for you. God bless you, my dear Mrs. Riedinger. I feel that this will be my last letter, as a hemorrhage is coming on and I may not be able to finish my letter. Mother joins me in thanks to all who have ever extended aid to me, and particularly my good old friend, Mr. Merritt, who has been a father to me, often shielded me. I ask the president, Mr. Geo. R. Storm, and Mrs. Hand and others to pardon me! Hark! I hear the angels calling—good-bye.

"Your friend, Ferdinand."

Drops of blood on the letter which Mrs. R. received Monday, 21st.

This is the last member of the famous family of John D. Fox. What valuable lessons the ministering spirits of Dr. Benj. Franklin, Emanuel Swedenborg, George Fox, Elias Hicks, Thomas Paine, John Murray, Wm. Ellery Channing and a host of intelligent spirits gave humanity. I am in hopes that 1908 will realize on advance in true religion and true, exalted Republicanism.

TITUS MERRITT.
New York, N. Y.

A GOLDEN SHEAF.

It is Highly Appreciated by Mr. and Mrs. E. W. Sprague.

We have just finished reading Hudson and Emma Rood Tuttle's last book "A Golden Sheaf." We read it together, and we never read a book that we more enjoyed. Mrs. Tuttle's beautiful poems and other sweet inspirational writings, so full of tenderness and love, together with her strong advocacy of the rights of man, woman, child, animal and bird, makes the book so interesting and fascinating that it was hard for us to lay it aside when it was time to retire for the night. And Mr. Tuttle's kind, clear, logical and unanswerable philosophy equally fascinating, though striking another string of the human harp, held our attention sometimes to the neglect of other duties. We would not part with this resume of the fifty golden years of service of this dear couple in the great field of reform, for a great deal. No Spiritualist library can be complete without this "Golden Sheaf."

May heaven continue to bless these noble and true workers in the great field of Modern Spiritualism.

MR. AND MRS. E. W. SPRAGUE.

The new church will be founded on moral science. Poets, artists, musicians, philosophers, will be its prophet teachers. The noblest literature of the world will be its Bible. Love and labor its holy sacraments—instead of worshiping one savior, we will gladly build an altar for everyone who has suffered for humanity.—Emerson.

I would rather be a poor man in a garret with plenty of books than a king who did not love reading.—Macaulay.

The Mission of Spiritualism.

A Lecture Delivered by Mrs. H. L. P. Russegue at Springfield, Mass.

Reported Stenographically by F. H. Beadle, for The Progressive Thinker.

I shall read to you this afternoon

The Song of the Mystic.

I walk down the valley of Silence,
Down the dim, voiceless valley alone,
And I hear not the fall of a footstep
Around me—save God's and my own!
And the hush of my heart is as holy
As hovers where angels have flown.

Long ago was I weary of voices
Whose music my heart could not win;
Long ago was I weary of noises
That fretted my soul with their din;
Long ago was I weary of places
Where I met only human and sin.

I walked through the world with the worldly;
And I craved what the world never gave;
And I said: "In the world, each Ideal
That shines like a star on life's wave,
Is toned on the shores of the real,
And sleeps, like a dream, in the grave."

And I toiled on, heart tired of the Human,
I moaned mid the mazes of men,
Till I knelt, long ago, at an altar,
And heard a Voice call me;—since then
I walked down the Valley of Silence,
That lies far beyond mortal ken.

Do you ask what I found in the Valley?
'Twas my trysting-place with the Divine,
And I fell at the feet of the Holy,
And about me a Voice said, "Be mine;"
And then rose from the depths of my spirit
An echo, "My heart shall be thine."

Do you ask how I live in the Valley?
I weep, and I dream, and I pray;
But my tears are as sweet as the dewdrops
That fall on the roses of May;
And my prayer, like a perfume from censer,
Ascendeth to God night and day.

In the hush of the Valley of Silence
I dream all the songs that I sing,
And the music floats down the dim Valley,
Till each finds a word for a wing;
That to men, like the dove of the deluge,
The message of peace they may bring.

But far on the deep there are billows
That never shall break on the beach,
And I have heard songs in the Silence
That never shall float into speech,
And I have heard dreams in the Valley
Too lofty for language to reach.

I have seen thoughts in the Valley.
Ah, me! how my spirit was stirred,
And they wear holy veils on their faces,
Their footsteps can never be heard;
They pass through the Valley like virgins,
Too pure for the touch of a word.

Do you ask me the place of the Valley,
Ye hearts that are furrowed with care?
It lieth afar between mountains,
And God and His angels are there;
And one is the dark Mount of Sorrow,
And one the bright mountain of Prayer.

I have chosen for my subject this afternoon the 79th verse of the first chapter of St. Luke:

"To give light to them that sit in darkness, and in the shadow of death, to guide our feet into the way of peace."

What is the mission of our truth; what does it stand for in the world; and why has it come to human souls; what is its mission?

There is no truth that has ever sifted down the ages that has not borne upon it the impress of a divinity always exceeding the age to which it comes. Every manifestation of truth that has been vouchsafed to humanity has been an uplift in some direction, and has awakened a new thought in the minds of the human family. That which is more spiritual than all else in life is that which uplifts the human thought to higher levels, which carries the mind into a higher phase of manifestation, and which leads the wisdom of the age to a larger fulfilling of its duties. Human nature is a curious combination when observed only from the surface, but when observed from its source its combination, the elements that form the component parts of human nature, we are able to trace the links in the great chain of human progress from one age to another until we are able to discern more clearly the causes of events and to what they may lead. It is not only religion that awakens man to a great realm of thought, it is the universal spirituality that abides in the souls of humanity that leads us to an aspiration that is the key to the door of the kingdom of God, and brings us to a closer communion with His spirit. This aspiration is Divine in its attributes, it is widespread in its influence, it ratifies every condition of human life, it delves to the deeps of human wisdom, it soars to the lofty heights of ambition, of spiritual unfolding. It develops within the human mind thoughts that before have been obscure; ideas that have been vaguely clothed; principles that have been only dimly caught sight of; ideals that point the way to that which may be. It has been said by scientific men that one branch of science has never advanced, and that was chemistry, that there was no such thing as the combination of chemical elements, that they were individualized and each dwells apart. This is not true, for has not one of your recent scientists, Professor McCall, determined this, and found in the ready activity of nature the combination of all elements which makes them contribute to the better way for the unfolding of spirituality. This is true in the human organism. Man takes into his body forces of nature, the life, the power, the potencies that inhere the atmosphere, the light, the conditions about him. He breathes out the debris, after the good has been derived from that source. Thus he is breathing in the oxygen, or life, or force, or energy, or power. He is breathing in the very potency of the spirit. He is giving out from his material organism carbonic acid gas, and he is giving out the forces that show to the world that he has utilized the combined elements that have been taken into the system. Thus his blood has all the laws inhering it that belong to the great dynamics of nature, the organs through which it passes are all contributive to the manifestation of its power. The nerve centers are the great batteries, the receiving centers of the power which indicates itself to the outer world, and yet in all this we are but getting the better manifestation of a law, of a potency, that leads us to a higher plane not only of thinking, but living. This, friends, is religion, because it is the bettering of the human conditions. It is the broadening of usefulness. It is the widening of duties. It is the multiplication of obligations. It is the discovery of all that may contribute to the unfolding of human life and thought.

We cannot confine it in one channel, in one continual branch of life or science. We may call physiology the science of the material body, psychology is the advance of the mental or spiritual life, and both are as blended as the light of day is blending with the conditions of humanity, as the darkness of the night is blending with the conditions of the earth, while during the day the vibration is going on, called forth by the great magnet, the sun, so as to warm the great necessity in the spiritual world, calling up and out of human nature its forces for the benefit of that nature. Thus the world is enlarging, it is growing better and higher, it is nobler to-day than ever before, and is making itself more manifest than it has ever accomplished in all the life that has been. It is bringing out from the deeps of nature, and human nature, its wealth; and is bringing out the many virtues that belong to human life, and multiplying them according to the multiplying needs.

What, then, does our religion, our truth, our principles, stand for? For the development of every condition of human life, from the lower to the higher, from the lesser to the greater, from the inferior to the superior, from the material to the spiritual, from earth to heaven, from the outside to the inside, and from the inside to the outermost world. It stands for the application of its laws to everyday life and to everyday condition. It stands not only for the healing of the bodies but the healing of minds, healing of morals, healing of all spiritual diseases, that it may be eliminated from human nature, and man stand upon a higher plane of activity. It stands for a better, a larger truth, for the abolishment of everything that can enslave or fetter human thought. It is opening channels through which the mind of man is flowing out into the world. The inventions of the age are one of the manifestations, and they are spiritual simply because they are the sources from which the great needs of the world are supplied. They are spiritual because they are flowing from a fount of knowledge, of wisdom, of power, and they are passing through human organisms, and are bearing their fruit in human benefits.

The world is modernized according to the present standard, it is modernized into its attributes, it has discovered unto itself broader means and higher avenues in which it will need a supply for every necessity, simply because the world is becoming more observant, more critical, more anxious, more spiritual. They are peering into the mists, and are seeking the causes for all acts, for all conditions; and religion that stands for such progress, is a religion that belongs to every condition of human life. No creed can fetter it; opinions must die, but thought and revelation must grow, and pour out its riches upon the world. It must bring to mankind something better.

What then is there that is better in our religion than all others? First, it teaches that righteousness is good and true, because it is righteousness. Not for the sake of yesterday, not for the sakeof a century or a thousand centuries ago, not for the sake of one man, not for the sake of one deity, but for the sake of all, the unity of all, the great magnified Divinity that reaches into every avenue, and out to every condition. It stands for a truth that penetrates these needs, and finds the root of all things. It is that which stands for justice; it stands for that justice that lives between man and man. It stands for the right, because right must rule ultimately. Therefore, you are taking a less tortuous route to the ultimates of life than when you are fettered by the chains of dogmatic opinion. It is doing away with the prejudices that have held the world in bondage. It is saying to the world, come up higher, and higher, for God's hands are outstretched and bidding you welcome unto Himself. It is speaking of a larger love, it is teaching man the importance of this larger life, it is teaching him how to clear the mists of superstition away. It is not because God has lived in the past; because the Nazarene has lived in the past; because Mohammed has lived in the past; because the Zend-avesta has given a new revelation to the world. Not for any of these, but for the sake of the great eternal to-morrow that is leading the hosts up the heights. This is what our religion stands for. It knows no such thing as creed. It lives in the warmth of God's sunshine. It breathes itself out in noble deeds. It is the power that inspires man to loftier thinking and holier living. It teaches us to worship God here as everywhere, to seek Him wherever He may abide, and as He is in all things make the way better and clearer for Godliness to live and make itself manifest unto us. It has no sect, it knows no classfication, it knows no such thing as pointing to punishments or rewards, but it teaches man that Justice is our King, Justice is our God, and Justice will always bring its own fruit, its own reward. Thus it teaches man the righteousness of right conduct, of an earnest endeavor to make himself and the world better. Meanwhile he is extending an influence to humanity that is helpful in all its attributes, and God comes nearer to the world.

You tell me: Oh! but you have abandoned the faith of the Elders, you have given up the hope of the Christian, you have forgotten the life of the Nazarene. Not by any means. Jesus lived his life in Nazareth, in Jerusalem; he did his work and did it well; he lived the life of the Essenes. He gave their philosophy to the world. He taught brotherhood, the dignity of labor, the sincerity of pure worship. He taught a brotherly love. I have not abandoned it, nor will I, nor does the religion of Spiritualism abandon it, nor does it ignore the teachings of the human Scriptures, which are the history of human nature; it by no means ignores them, but takes from them the good, and points the way to a better to-morrow.

Our religion does not say, thus far shalt thou go, and no farther. It reaches up the heights until you have reached the Infinite spirit that knows no limitation, that knows no boundary, that knows no power that is not to be greater, no light that is not to be brighter, no law that is not to be larger, no power that is not to be mightier, no infinity that can by any means be circumscribed by human thought. For this, friends, our religion stands. It stands for growth, it stands for progress, it stands for the establishment of the kingdom of God in man, and in that kingdom do we find wisdom. It stands for a larger and better humanity; it stands for a universal love; it stands for a divine outpouring, like a shower of light from on high to all the world, because it tells of eternal life, or an endless immortality, and there is no such thing as light without growth, there is no such thing as life without an unfolding potency from within, and it stands for unfolding that force of human spirit that leads us to the higher, the better, the truer, the nobler wisdom of God.

Friends, it stands for a larger science. It stands for a science of life. It stands for a scientific investigation of every principle; for a science that shall open the avenues of the spiritual world here as elsewhere. It stands for a larger and sweeter spirituality, and what does this mean? It means a closer kinship. The moment the world enters into cognition of a spiritual kinship, by which you are all bound together, then there is the product of a sweeter brotherhood.

We have drawn a picture of a heaven from the ultimate of our imagination, we have put it beyond the stars, we have paved its streets with gold, we have studded its gates with gems, we have builded its altars of precious stones, and its music we have made according to the higher harmonies of our imagination. We have taught the world to believe it is just beyond our reach. Ah me! its melody can sing itself into human nature; you can hear the voices of the angels, you can listen to their tuneful songs that they are singing through the courts of the higher life, you can accept their mandates, and they will tell you of an endless growth, they will speak to you of a greater usefulness than you have dreamed of. They will make the earth more spiritual and that will bring the world to a closer relationship with God, that will bring mankind into one great circle, man with God, and God with man.

Benediction.

May the peace that passeth understanding, and the joy that cometh from truth, abide within your life; may you be crowned by the glory of a higher truth, a nobler, richer hope, a diviner trust in God and man. Amen.

A CHARMING NARRATIVE.

Written by the Spirit of a Little Girl, Who Passed to Spirit Life in a Cellar.

Many years ago, fair Aunt Alice says I lived in a cellar in a great big city with my mother, who washed, washed, all of the time, only when she was hanging things up on the lines that were strung all over our cellar, to dry, or when she was putting coal into the stove to make the fire hot to dry them. One day in every week she didn't wash at home, but took me wrapped up in an old blanket, to a place where the sun shone and made bright places everywhere. Here, too, mother washed all day, but she hung the clothes to dry on lines stretched out of-doors with the blue sky over them and green grass under them. Sometimes Patrick, the gardener, would let me lie on the grass while mother went in to wash, and once such a lovely white kitten came running by; I cried out and put out my hands to catch her.

One day when the snow was on the ground I was so hot and cross, and had such sore throat that my mother did not take me when she went to the garden house to wash, but left me all alone in the cellar. I wanted some water so bad, but could not get it, and I cried a little, but not loud, my throat hurt me so bad, and then something choked me dreadful, and then I went to sleep. I don't know what happened then, for fair Aunt Alice hasn't told me, but when I awoke I was all alone in the dark, and I was so cold, oh, so cold, and my teeth kept shutting and shutting, and I shook all over. Then I got frightened, it was so cold and dark, and I cried "mamma, mamma," just as loud as I could.

But mamma didn't hear me, but a beautiful lady did, and she came running to me, and she brought a light with her, and I could see her. Then I cried harder than before, for I had never seen fair Aunt Alice then, and I was afraid. "I want my mamma," I said. "Dear little one," and Aunt Alice took me into her arms and cuddled me up to her soft white dress, and I got warm in just a minute, for Aunt Alice kept smoothing me from head to foot all of the time, and it made me so warm and contented for a little while; then I thought of mamma. No other woman had ever taken me in their arms before but mamma, and I was afraid again. "See here, little one," said dear Aunt Alice, and oh, I cried, for I was in Patrick's beautiful garden, with the lovely white kitten just cuddled up to my throat, and I held my hands tight over it and it said, "Pur-r-r-r, pur-r-r-r," so sweet, oh, so sweet, and I patted it and kissed it, and I put my cheek on its soft fur. Oh! it was so lovely, I can't tell you how lovely it was. The sun was shining warm and bright. I wasn't sick, nor hot, nor cold, nor hungry, but just happy with my mother there hanging up the fine white clothes to dry on the line, and Patrick hoeing near by. I could hear him strike the weeds with his hoe, and mother talking with him, or with the other woman who helped her when she washed in Patrick's garden, and I just lay on the soft, cool grass, hugging the little, white kitty in my arms, and went fast asleep. When I awoke again, I was lying on a soft, white bed, and kitty was sitting beside me lapping her little pink toes with her tongue, then rubbing her face all over with her paw. It was so dear, and I was so happy that I laughed. I don't think I ever laughed before. You know little girls who live in cellars and are hot or cold all the time and can't walk, and always in the way. They cry, but they don't laugh; only happy warm people laugh. But I didn't think of that, for in a moment fair Aunt Alice was kneeling by my bed and smoothing me all down, and I loved her dearly, and was never afraid any more. I kept going to sleep, then waking up and looking for my kitty; then going to sleep again. One day I was lying on the floor by Aunt Alice, and my dear little kitten was jumping and playing around me, and I sighed. In a moment Aunt Alice held up before me a piece of bright, pink ribbon. "Oh," I said, "I just wanted the pretty ribbon to put around kitty's neck, but I didn't think I could have it. Then I thought of something: "Ain't we poor any more, Aunt Alice?"

"No, dear," said dear Aunt Alice. "You will never be poor again, for your heart is full of love for all things, and love will make you rich, oh, so rich, dear, that you can give and give, and the more you give the richer you will be."

I understood her, although I did not know what she meant; but it made me strong all in a minute, and I got up from the floor, and stood on my feet and my dress was as blue as the sky in Patrick's garden, and as soft as the light clouds that used to float over it when I lay on the grass while mother hung out the clothes to dry.

Just then a gentleman I had seen talking with fair Aunt Alice came toward me smiling so happily, and clapping his hands softly together and crying, "Bravo, little one," and the happy tears were just running over Aunt Alice's dear cheeks, and my kitty seemed to understand it, for she jumped onto Aunt Alice's lap, then up on my shoulder, and tapped my cheek with her dear velvet paw. I don't know how 'I knew it, but I did know that everybody and everything was rejoicing with me for I had gained MYSELF. I had never been all myself on the earth, only a sick little cripple for seven years. Now I was strong, and well, and eager to do for others what these dear hearts had done for me. So I tell you this little bit of my story, and if you like it I would love dearly to tell you more, for I know a great many little earth children who are taught to be afraid of beautiful death. They can't see any further than the grave, Aunt Alice says. I don't know what she means by grave, for I have never seen one. Poor folks don't have graves of their own you know; that is, very poor folks like my mother and me who live in dark cellars in big cities, for they can't get money enough to buy a piece of land all for themselves.

And now I want to tell you why I was so cold, and why it was so dark when I awoke after the sleep of death. It was because everybody was glad to have me die, and glad to get me out of the way, so no one sent loving thoughts after me. "For love is the light of the world, and if you love people and people love you, no place can be cold and dark," Aunt Alice tells me to say.

One thing more. You wonder how Aunt Alice found me in the dark cellar. Well, she is one who hears, and sees, and feels in the dark, for she loves and pities all things that suffer. So my frightened cry reached her, for it was full of sorrow. Do you think Aunt Alice unhappy? NO, oh, no! No one is as happy as she is, and I am going to try to be just like her, and that is why I chose the name Little Alice.

PARKLAND HEIGHTS LYCEUM.

Celebration of the Sixtieth Anniversary.

To the Editor: The Parkland Heights Lyceum held the sixtieth anniversary of Spiritualism on April 12.

The conductor, S. Roberts Dunlop, M.D., offered some remarks upon the rise and progress of Spiritualism, its application to the everyday transactions, of its philosophy and the missionary purposes of each of us, and our duty to decry and condemn all fraud or its appearance. He was followed by an instrumental selection, singing and recitations.

Augusta C. Volk, of Philadelphia, addressed the children on the topic of the day, advising them not to be afraid if they heard raps, or saw a light or lights, to ever bear in mind that spirit guardian angels were ever with them, and used these means to communicate and give knowledge of their presence. To the adults she was very emphatic not to tolerate under any condition FRAUD, in no matter whatsoever guise it may appear, but denounce it fearlessly and boldly.

William Hibbert, of Trenton, N. J., said: "This audience is composed of human beings, ranging from the small bud, to the full-grown flower. The young may be taught by the adult members of Lyceums how to meet and overcome many of the difficulties of life. Do not fail to perform this duty with all the power of a developed spirit.

"You see here a large variety of potted plants, full of bloom. These plants have had experienced care; but here is a tiny bud, unopened. By attempting to force its leaves apart, its beauty is destroyed or injured; so with the children under your care. Both parents and instructors, it is for you to furnish the true spiritual conditions, and leave the rest, like the bud, to its own time to develop to a life of usefulness and beauty."

Frank E. Luce, president of the Parkland Heights Camp Meeting Association, was pleased to find that the Lyceum was so far advanced, and was proud of this, its offspring.

Mrs. Hannah Luce said it filled her with joy to be with them where everything was so harmonious and conducive to spirit return; that the fear of death was eliminated, and creeds and dogmas were passing.

The retiring conductor, Geo. W. Brelsford, and wife, Guardian, were presented by Henry Thompson, with a beautiful painting, executed by Mrs. Hortense Kenyon, an artist of great ability (also our organist), with appropriate remarks thereto.

After singing "God be With You Till We Meet Again," closed an event to be remembered, the sixtieth anniversary, where all was love, harmony and peace, thanks to the guardian angels and spirit friends that were present in great force.

We assembled shortly about the overflowing tables of good fare, consumed by keen appetite, with much merriment and wit, and then separated to our respective homes.

Eye Glasses Not Necessary.

Eyesight Can Be Strengthened, and Most Forms of Diseased Eyes Successfully Treated Without Cutting or Drugging.

That the eyes can be strengthened so that eye glasses can be dispensed with in many cases has been proven beyond a doubt by the testimony of hundreds of people who publicly claim that their eyesight has been restored by that wonderful little instrument called "Actina." "Actina" also relieves sore and granulated lids, iritis, etc., and removes cataracts without cutting or drugging. Over 75,000 "Actinas" have been sold, therefore the "Actina" treatment is not an experiment, but is reliable. The following letters are but samples of hundreds we receive:

J. J. Pope, P. O. Box, No. 43, Mineral Wells, Texas, writes—"I have spent thousands of dollars on my eyes, consulted the best doctors in the United States, dropped medicine in my eyes for years and "Actina" is the only thing that has ever done me any good. Before using "Actina" I gave up all hope of ever being able to read again. Had not read a newspaper for seven years. Now I can read all day with little or no inconvenience."

Rev. Charles Carter, East Springfield, N. Y., writes:—I have made a severe test of "Actina" by casting aside my glasses and have not had them on since except to see what change had been wrought since the treatment began. My eyes gradually gained strength and power, and now my glasses are no longer necessary, for I see as well, if not better, without them. I recommend "Actina" to all my friends.

E. R. Holbrook, Deputy County Clerk, Fairfax, Va., writes:—"Actina has cured my eyes so that I can do without glasses. I very seldom have headache now, and can study up to eleven o'clock after a hard day's work at the office."

"Actina" can be used by old and young with perfect safety. Every member of the family can use the one "Actina" for any form of disease of the Eye, Ear, Throat or Head. One will last for years, and is always ready for use. "Actina" will be sent on trial, postpaid.

If you will send your name and address to the Actina Appliance Co., Dept. 342N, 811 Walnut street, Kansas City, Mo., you will receive, absolutely FREE, a valuable book—Professor Wilson's Treatise on Disease.

From Dream to Vision of Life

By Lilian Whiting, Author of "The World Beautiful," "The Spiritual Significance," "The Outlook Beautiful," etc.

This book finds its keynote in the question asked by the Archbishop of Canterbury—"The Life Beyond,—what it is? What is its bearing on these present working years?" To the discussion of this vital problem Miss Whiting brings the results of modern scientific research and that peculiar spiritual clairvoyance which has been remarked in "The Life Radiant" and some of her other books. It is written with a certain joyous vitality that communicates itself to the reader in a certain radiance and liberation of new energies. Price $1.00 net.

Correspondent writes: "The Chicago Spiritualist' League monthly Mass-meeting will be the event of the season, and with the exception of the many picnics soon to be given in conjunction with the State Association, will be just about the closing event, until the coming of the cooling autumn winds return and fan the heated air of summer into a mere recollection. The Programs for the Mass-meeting have been pretty thoroughly circulated, and the spiritualistic public is agog over the pleasures to be anticipated. The League is progressing as no other society in the State is, and all because it is doing something that recommends itself to the better class of thinking people. It is no longer an enigma what the League is doing. Spiritualists and mediums are aware of its telling and efficient work in separating the wheat from the chaff. Take your lunch to Handel Hall, Saturday afternoon, and buy your coffee fresh from the pot when you get there. Remember the Date, Saturday, May 9, 1908.

Mary B. Hill writes: April 23rd was the last meeting of the Band of Harmony to be held in the hall for the season. It being the celebration of Mrs. Richmond's birthday, the hall was filled with members and friends who were there with congratulations; some who had listened to her inspiration when she was but a child, and others since the organization of the society 35 years ago. The tables in charge of Mrs. Fredrickson, was daintily spread. One birthday cake was in evidence, the creation of Mrs. Pridmore. The room was beautifully decorated, the platform one bank of flowers. There was a canoe filled with blossoms arranged by Mrs. Hattie Peet. General Hotchkiss superintended the coffee urn. Miss Alice L'Hommedieu, our own sweet singer, added enjoyment with her Spring Song. Mrs. Lucinda Chandler and Mrs. Mary Hare (both veteran workers), also Mrs. Ashton, assistant pastor, spoke well, earnest words of praise, and no greater tribute could be given to one than Mrs. Richmond received that day. Hers has been a steady pioneering work for the advancement and upliftment of humanity, and nothing has daunted her fearless stand for truth and spiritual light. The next meeting of the Band of Harmony will be held at the home of the pastor, Mrs. and Mr. Richmond, 3802 Ridge avenue, Rogers Park. Take Evanston car or Howard avenue and Wentworth car to Lunt avenue, and walk west. Afternoon session to begin at 3:30 o'clock. Intermission for supper, to gather violets and feed the squirrels. Bring your supper. All are cordially invited to this beautiful home."

C. Baker writes: "At the residence of Mrs. M. Schumacher, Tuesday evening, April 21, the members of the Hephzibah Order, celebrated their anniversary. Many were enrolled as members. This order is an auxiliary of the Spiritual Church of the Students of Nature. Spiritual communications were given by the pastor. Articles are magnetized the first Tuesday of each month for the sick only, at 144 Loomis st. The mission of this order is to visit all classes that are in distress, the aged and unfortunate, and do charitable work. Many families in need have been cared for by supplying them with fuel and provisions from this order. After the ceremony of enrolling the members, refreshments were served. The evening passed with singing, recitations and many a good time. The Hephzibah's treasury netted a good fund for its coming work next winter.

Cicero Newell writes from Madison Park, Seattle, Wash.: "I am putting up a church at Madison Park, where I will give illustrated lectures on the scenes as portrayed in the Bible. I will commence with the life of Christ (moving pictures). My church will be ready for my work by the first of May. It will be known as 'THE LITTLE CHURCH AROUND THE CORNER.' It is 24 by 60 feet. Some of the leading ministers of this city are my friends, although they think I am a little off of my base. They will not oppose me. Let me hear from you often. Send the paper to me here."

Born to Mr. Alexander Bourg and wife (formerly Lina Grace North), niece of John W. Ring, a girl baby, April 13, at Watson, Colorado.

Eugene Hendricks of St. Louis, Mo., writes: "Mrs. E. B. Price of the Society of Spiritual Research, 3001 S. Broadway, was called away to Kansas City, Mo., where she has many friends, who are delighted to have her lecture for them, and to be with them on Easter Sunday, April 19. The Easter program was most excellent, consisting of instrumental music, singing, recitations, and lectures by Mrs. F. C. Krass, and Mrs. E. B. Price. It was a good meeting. The hall was filled to its utmost capacity; there was not even standing room left. A good many seeds were sown on good ground, and have taken root. We are doing a good work in the Cause, and will still continue to do so."

Correspondent writes: "A very enjoyable time was had at the social and dance on Saturday night, April 25th, at the Hyde Park society Hall, given in behalf of Sister Wilson. Remarks were made by Brother Burgess and Brother Kirchner, and Sisters Hill and Wilson. Beautiful solos were rendered by Sister Williams and Brother Parry of Roseland. Recitations were given by Miss Clark and Sister Lichtig, which, while they were very amusing, were also instructive, bringing rounds of applause. The music rendered by Prof. Richards' Orchestra, of Roseland, was very fine, particularly for the dancing which was enjoyed by all. Luncheon was served by the ladies, and of course it need not be said, but it was good. As the hours approached morning we all went our ways homeward to the tune of Home, Sweet Home, feeling glad we were there."

Correspondent writes: "The Progressive Spiritualists' Society, 183 North avenue, presided over by Mrs. B. Hilbert, listened attentively to a thirty minutes discourse by Dr. T. Wilkins, Sunday evening, May 3, and an enthusiastic short talk and clear and concise spiritual messages by the pastor, Mrs. Hilbert, and the house was well filled. A feeling of sweet peace and harmony prevailed."

Spiritualists are requested to bring their children to the League meeting Saturday afternoon, May 9, at 2 o'clock sharp, to talk over the Lyceum work, and provide ways and means and if possible to form a nucleus upon which to establish a permanent work in this line, and don't forget to take your lunch and spend the entire afternoon and evening at Handel hall. A grand good time is always assured at these meetings. Every certificate medium should be on hand to respond to calls.

J. L. Everett writes from Rockford, Ill.: "At our meeting last Sunday evening we had the pleasure of listening to Mrs. D. L. West, of Elgin, Ill. As a lecturer and medium we find this lady to rank with the best, and although the evening was a very stormy one, we had over 70 in attendance, which speaks very highly of her drawing power. We hope that we may be able to have her with us again in the near future. In my last communication to you in giving a list of those that had recently served this society, I inadvertantly omitted to include the name of Dr. G. A. Burgess, who had served this society on two or three different occasions with complete satisfaction to us and the cause. We are impatiently waiting the time to come for our mass-meeting, and hope to have a good time and a big turnout."

Mrs. Carrie L. Hatch writes from 9 Appleton street, Appleton hall, Boston, Mass.: "The First Spiritualist Ladies' Aid Society met as usual. The entertainment in the evening was given by the following people: Mrs. A. S. Waterhouse, Mrs. Annie Chapman, Mr. Harwood, Mrs. Lizzie M. Shackley and Mrs. Dick. Mrs. Mary Lovering presided at the piano. Next Friday, May 8, we will have a May Party, supper and Snip Sale. Be sure and come. Friday, May 29, we will hold memorial services."

Mrs. A. W. Bloom writes: "The Illinois Sunflower Club will give a party at the residence of our president, Mrs. J. R. Francis, 40 Loomis street, Saturday evening, May 23. We hope every member of the Club will come and bring their friends. The committee in charge are planning something very unique. Every lady, whether a member of the Club or not, is expected to bring lunch for two. The boxes containing lunch will be sold to the highest bidder, and the lady bringing the most beautifully decorated lunch box, will be given a prize. There will be a good program, and we hope to have a good time. We hope all the members will exert themselves to help us on this occasion. We hope to have our plans completed so we can give a part, if not all of the program next week."

The Starlight Spiritual Society, 586 32d street, will have a social and raffle May 6. Everybody welcome.

Talks on Spiritualism.

The Fraternal Order of Spiritualists, an incorporated society, held its first meeting last evening at American Mechanics' hall. J. E. Darling, president, made an interesting statement concerning the origin and progress of the religion of Spiritualism. He said the Bible was a Spiritualistic text-book from beginning to end, its Spiritualism was its beauty, its grace and its interest. He said the pulpit had for some reason thrown aside the spiritual teachings of the Bible and upon that truth alone Spiritualism had built an enormous structure under whose roof hundreds of thousands find satisfactory shelter from the storms of life. The ministry of unseen beings is one of the most important doctrines of the Christian church and it is also one of the most neglected.—Springfield (Mass.) Union.

The Cause at Columbus, Ohio.

This has been the most prosperous season in our history, spiritually, financially and otherwise. The first Sunday of each month we take in our new members, using the N. S. A. ritual. Will take in a class next Sunday, which makes over forty new members this season.

We are clear of debt, own our church and the lot adjoining, and have several hundred dollars subscribed towards our fund for a new temple.

A united and energetic membership is bringing success to our society.

Many good and eloquent speakers have been with us this winter.

Hon. Wm. Strong, of Hamilton, Canada, serves our society for May, with Mrs. Harris as our message bearer.

We are making great preparations for the Ohio Convention, which meets in our church, May 29 and 30. Business sessions at 10 a. m. and 2 p. m., with lectures and messages at 7:30 in the evening. On Sunday, 31st, there will be three sessions at Miss Harlow's church, 186 S. 3rd street. The committee has secured a $1.00 a day rate at the Boyden hotel, Town and 4th streets, for all who attend.

Ohio Spiritualists, arouse and join with us in making this the grandest convention ever held.

Many prominent workers have been engaged and each session will be a spiritual treat.

April has been a busy month for the writer, having officiated at the funeral of Sister Maggie Nelson, 402 S. 3rd street, Columbus; Mrs. Polly Bowshier, at Circleville, O.; and Sister Anna Arden, whose funeral services I conducted at our church last Monday.

I also officiated at two beautiful home weddings: Wm. H. Goodshaw and Miss Rose Stephan at the home of her aunt, this city, and Chas. E. Martin and Miss Myrtle DeHaven, of Altoona, Pa. On both occasions the homes were beautifully decorated with cut flowers and potted plants. After the ceremonies all present partook of the beautiful wedding supper.

I will answer calls for funerals within easy reach of Columbus. Permanent address 172 McDowell street.

H. E. BOERSTLER,
President West Side Church.
Columbus, Ohio.

MOVING AHEAD!

The Institutional Church as a Factor in Progress.

The "Institutional Church "[as set forth in the Chicago Daily Journal] "is an awkward and inadequate name for a most important factor in modern progress, without the help of which great urban communities can not be advanced much further on the lines of ethical nobility, social purity, and civic enthusiasm. It is a new name for an old thing. Sabbatarian limitations, seventh-day activities, did not belong to the early Christian movement. In all religions specialized places and dates are sacerdotal additions marking a later but not a higher development which may help but never adequately represent religions at work.

There is place for a seventh day for rest and special culture, but the demand is for A SEVEN-DAY CHURCH—RELIGION AT WORK ALL THE WEEK, PIETY IN THE HARNESS, SPIRITUALLY ON DUTY AND ETHICS ORGANIZING ITSELF IN INSTRUMENTALITIES OF HELPFULNESS, HUMAN SYMPATHY, AND SOCIAL CHEER. The church that is to be a factor in progress must become more and more a point toward which all legitimate needs of human beings may rightfully turn and profitably gravitate and from which all possible helps to the enlargement of soul and the ennobling of the community will radiate.

The institutional church is to religion what manual training is to education. True culture comes not through precept, but through practice. Religion is not a matter of indoctrination, but of training, discipline. A Sunday church with only a mid-week prayer meeting attachment can never become an adequate training school for citizenship and the holy, i. e., wholesome life. A church that does not keep its doors open as many days in the week as the saloon, the gambling room, and the brothel necessarily wages a losing war.

Just as ninety-five per cent of our school children must eventually work out life's problems with their hands, so ninety-five per cent of the salvation of the community must be wrought out by helpful practice, BY APPLIED MORALITY. Sin as an abstraction is a subject for debate, for theological disputation, but sins as concrete misdemeanors, as a dissipation of life's forces, are matters of observation, not of theories, and it is the business of the church to use not one, but every possible means to amend the bad habit, strengthen the unused muscle, and cultivate holy and healthy aptitudes.

In the city of Chicago there are between 7,000 and 8,000 saloons doing business, all of them working from eighteen to twenty-four hours a day for seven days in the week. There are probably between 1,500 and 2,000 churches, missions, chapels, etc., in the city of Chicago, and the majority of these are closed for the most part with the exception of a few hours on Sunday and a few evening hours during the week day, and even then attract only a limited class.

THE "INSTITUTIONAL CHURCH" is simply religion gone into business; is the church of the good Samaritan, one that is always looking out for the bruised; the church of the prodigal son, and has always a father's welcome to the wayward. Not less but all the more is it the church of the anthem and the altar. Christianity bargained for imbecility and artificiality when it tried to escape the world, when it courted sanctity in caves; those modern darkened places where only a dim religious light obtains are reminiscences of mediaeval thought and architecture.

THE "INSTITUTIONAL CHURCH" is a church that moves the previous question; that is too busy with ethical problems, with human woes and human inspiration, to waste time over theological refinings, textual battles and creedal fences. With the growth of the "INSTITUTIONAL CHURCH" there must necessarily come a decline of dogma and an increase of that love which finds its highest expression in loyalty and service.

It may be well urged that all churches undertake to discharge this function, that there is nothing new in the attempt. This is just our contention. All churches do live and grow and are potent in proportion as they succeed in instituting their message, institutionalizing their conviction. Matthew Arnold's dictum is as wholesome and important a truth in the life of the church as it is in the life of an individual. "Three-fourths of life is conduct."

THE "INSTITUTIONAL CHURCH" is simply a potent church which hears and heeds seven days in the week the words of the Master, "My Father worketh even until now, and I work."

The above is from that eminent Divine, Jenkin Lloyd Jones, and exhibits great progress, presenting an ideal religion for the world to consider.

LIFE'S PROGRESSION.

"There is no death; there are no dead."

These words stand out on the cover of Edward C. Randall's new book. They are a challenge to the orthodox world, and through all of its pages runs this challenge to those whose ideas of God, of heaven, of hell, of a future life are based strictly upon the Bible. Yet Mr. Randall believes in life hereafter, based on positive knowledge given him from the living friends passed to the life beyond. Price $1.50.

Portland, Ore., Anniversary.

We of the First Spiritual Society and the State Association united in a massmeeting the last Sunday in March and carried out a program prepared by the State President, Mrs. Sophia B. Seip, and the president of the First Society, and on a scale never equaled in the history of our spiritual work here. We had with us Harrison D. Barrett in all the strength of his inspiration and many other noble and faithful workers in our cause, such as Mrs. C. Cornelius, Mrs. Ladd-Finnican and Mrs. Congdon, to help make the day a grand success. The State Society held the morning service at their hall, from whence they were escorted by the Lyceum children with their flags and banners to the First Society hall, which was beautifully decorated. Tables were spread for the accommodation of three hundred at a time, for the grand banquet prepared for them by many ready and willing hands. While the orchestra played, those present marched to their places beneath an arch made of flags held in the hands of the children, making a scene never to be forgotten by the happy friends present.

Under the able leadership of Mrs. Dr. Coon our Lyceum has reached a stage of development that is the pride of everyone among us, as it is a means to educate our children in the truths of Spiritualism, that they may become full grown, well rounded out and happy men and women, as was pictured by Brother Barrett in the evening, when he spoke before a large audience on the "Advent of Modern Spiritualism and Its Application to the Lives We Now Lead." May heaven bless our beloved president, Mrs. Emily Driscoll, for engaging him for that day and for some time to come, for surely nothing is greater than our love for him and our grand workers, unless it be our lack of knowledge of how to apply that love.

DISAPPOINTMENTS.

All along life's lengthy journey,
Disappointments cross my path;
Where I used to moan in sorrow,
Now I greet them with a laugh.

For I find they're all so needed,
To give scope and broader view;
And I learned to live for many,
Where before I loved a few.

Ah! how bitter were my crosses,
Almost more than I could bear!
I was taught to feel for others
And with them their sorrows share.

So without our disappointments,
We'd not know the worth of sorrow;
Oft the thing we so much wanted,
Would bring ruin on the morrow.

Let us then be ever patient,
Sorrows come, and joy is given;
If we learn to be unselfish,
Then in vain we have not striven.

To Raise Palmists' Licenses.

At the meeting of the Police Commissioners Chief Kern recommended that the City Council be asked to raise the license for palmists, mediums, seers and fortune tellers from $30 to $75 a month. The chief gave as his reason for the request that too many of them are coming to the city. The Commission took the suggestion under advisement.—Los Angeles Paper.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

This department is under the management of

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Everyone has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected. HUDSON TUTTLE.

T. A. Merwin:—Q.—A child, five years old, has paralysis of one limb, from the knee down. It can walk, but the foot turns over. Can you in your department suggest a cure?

A.—In such a case the paralyzed parts should be supported so that the foot cannot turn from its true position while walking. This can be readily done by a splint and proper appliance on the foot. While this is on, walking should be encouraged, after which it should be removed and the limb receive a thorough massage. should be given three times a day.

Drugs or medicines of any kind are useless, worse than useless in such cases.

The support must not be continuous, for the development of the muscles will only take place by their use.

The massage should be continued at least twenty minutes each time.

A good surgeon should be consulted in adjusting the support to the limb.

Dr. R. Greer:—Q.—(1) When human lives are, by accident, torn to shreds or blown to atoms, or when decapitated by guillotine, as in France, what effect may such have upon the anatomical structure of the Ego or life of the indwelling spirit? (2) There are many theories as to the present law of human generation, the new Petersilea's theory among the rest—which of all the different theories do you favor most? (3) A feature of "the Angel's Message," given by the angel Louis Kossuth—formerly a statesman of Hungarian fame—being strongly radical, anti-clerical and anti-Christian, would it, in consequence, in face of certain existing postal laws be considered unmailable?

A.—(1) The spiritual being cannot be changed in form or substance by its physical garment, and whether death came by the slowest or swiftest process—death meaning separation—the spirit remains unaffected.

(2) The answer to this question I quote from the Arcana of Nature, Vol. II.: "If the spirit exists, it is supported by law; then it is originated by law, and its intimate relations to the body presuppose a common origin. • • • If the parents have immortal spirits as well as mortal bodies, and if their corporeal frames support the corporeal being of the foetus than their spiritual natures must in an equal measure support the spirit of the foetus."

The evolution of life from protozoon to man has for its last term, not man—but his immortal spirit. • • • So far as generation and growth are concerned, there is no difference between the phenomena in animals and man. The growth or evolution is carried farther in man. In the words of the spirit-author above quoted, the spirit-arch which the body as a scaffolding upholds is in man completed by the insertion of the keystone, and is self-supporting when this scaffolding is torn away by death.

(3) If attention were called to such passages, objections might be made by the postal authorities, but such ruling—excluding from the mail such matter—could not be sustained, and officials are too wise to commit themselves. The press is free, in its criticisms of religious beliefs, as the believers are in acceptance of such belief. The exception is made when the vital principles of the government are assailed, and treason to constitutional law proclaimed as justifiable, noble and heroic. Books advocating substitution of a king for our Uresident; promulgation of Mohammedanism, or extreme radicalism, pass unquestioned through the mail. The Mormon doctrine of polygamy is suppressed by the government, but the Mormon Bible is not refused by the postoffice.

Villification and slander most infamous of public officials, hideous cartoons approaching often the obscene, are circulated without an objecting word.

Obscene publications, and such as directly advocate defiance of law, and thus stimulate crime, are justly excluded.

As a nation, we are advocates of law and order and a government of the people has the right to protect its laws until the people change them. It may be said that the authority given the head of the postal department is too unlimited, yet, that authority has been used with remarkable leniency, and publications have been received that in any other country would have been considered of most treasonable character.

J. S. Lhk.—Q.—When and where did Prof. William Denton die?

A.—Prof. Denton, when visiting Australia for the purpose of scientific investigation, joined an expedition fitted out by the government, to explore the almost unknown archipelago to the south of that continental island, especially Borneo. His two sons accompanied him, and returned to tell the sad news of his death. He died of fever Aug. 26, 1883, at a little native village called Berigabadi, among the mountains of New Guinea, seventy-five miles due east of Port Moresby.

R. A. Dague.—Q.—An extraordinary acuteness of vision in the sleep-walking state has attracted the notice of Dr. James W. Russell in a girl of twenty-one, observed last August, at the Birmingham (Eng.) hospital. The patient, a teacher, typewriter and music student, was reversed and more or less hysterical, and in three years she had had four seasons of sleep walking, with almost nightly rising in sleep, for several weeks at each period. She usually left her bed beone and two in the morning. She was not easily aroused, appearing wide awake but recognizing nobody, and in this condition she attempted various tasks, playing the piano, tuning her violin, reading, studying harmony, crocheting and writing letters. It was found that this work was always done in almost absolute darkness. A letter was written to a relative, but on being asked to copy the address in the same light, when awake, she was unable to see and wrote a confused jumble of lines, one over another. She crocheted well and wrote a very accurate musical essay. The eyes seemed normal. Another curious feature of her case was that, contrary to usual experience, she could recall events of her sleep, seeming to have a very clear recollection of them.—Denver Republican.

Will you please explain the phenomena mentioned above. Have we a conscious and a sub-conscious mind as taught by Hudson or a Divine mind and a Mental mind as promulgated by Mary Baker Eddy? If neither of these authors is correct, what is the true explanation?

A.—To thoroughly treat this question of the conscious and sub-conscious, and the "mortal mind," would require more time and space than can be afforded. These theories have received treatment at some length in this department. I will content myself by simply stating an explanation which explains, and leaves not a single fact unnamed. All these complex, confusing, and mysterious phenomena arise from the dual constitution of man. He is a spirit and a physical body, and the spirit is dominated by the body. But it becomes at times more or less free from its environments, and in proportion takes on the characteristics of a spirit. It gains spiritual faculties and senses. It may become influenced by a control by other spiritual beings.

ITEMS OF INTEREST.

From Mrs. Elizabeth Schauss, of Toledo, Ohio.

To the Editor: Word has just reached me of the accidental death of Mr. Thomas F. Keogh (a subscriber to The Progressive Thinker), formerly of Toledo, but for three years of Shreveport, Louisiana. Mr. Keogh was a switchman and was crushed between the bumpers of two freight cars while attempting to couple them. The remains were brought to Toledo for interment beside those of his wife who preceded him about seven years ago.

Mr. Keogh was raised a Catholic, but after the death of his wife became a Spiritualist and had unfolded splendid mediumship which he placed at the disposal of those who needed it, and always free gratis. We rejoice with him in his freedom.

Easter Sunday I was engaged in Findlay, Ohio. The subjects were suggested by people in the audience, and were, "Woman as a Factor in the Progress of the World's Work," and "The Resurrection." Large audiences were present both afternoon and evening. The Lyceum there under the leadership of Mrs. Greenlee is truly an inspiration, and is progressing nicely.

April 26 found me in Massillon, Ohio, where a few of the faithful rented a splendid hall and opened the doors free to the public to listen to two lectures delivered by the writer on the subjects of "What is Spiritualism?" and "If You Knew That You Would Die To-morrow, What Would You Do To-night?" Both were selected by the audience.

The attendance was all that could be wished for, and after the evening meeting a long half hour was spent in further explanations to people who do not, but would like to, understand more about Spiritualism.

The first and second Sundays in May will find me in Jackson, Mich.

Please accept my sincere thanks for your valued assistance in the work of the Lyceum by printing the Lessons in The Progressive Thinker. I receive many letters from individuals who read them there.

Lyceum work is progressing, as I see from the letters which reach me from various places.

"Love Light and Truth Lyceum" in Toledo, is in good working order, and increasing in numbers steadily.

Missouri State Association now has a state superintendent of Lyceums, Mrs. Etta Bledsoe, of Kansas City. This is a move in the right direction. Every State Association should follow suit.

Battle Creek Lyceum and Society are flourishing; it could not be otherwise under Will J. Erwood, whose lectures are practical lessons in right-living, and a source of help to all who hear them.

MRS. ELIZABETH SCHAUSS.

An Impressive Vision.

To the Editor: I wish to relate something wonderful that happened at our place on the morning of the San Francisco earthquake. I awoke about 3:20 a. m. on April 18, and saw a spirit standing on the side of the pillow that separated my wife's head and mine. The apparition was about two feet high, and had the appearance of a child about three years old. It was clothed in dazzling white that had a transparent hue. The form remained about two minutes, and then slowly faded away, and as it disappeared, I heard clairvoyantly a dull, distant roar, such as a wind or hailstorm would make at a distance. As the night had been rainy, I felt alarmed at the noise, as this was the cyclone period here. I sprang out of bed, and rushed to the window, but the night was calm, not even a breath of air was stirring. My wife awoke as I came back to bed, and asked what was wrong.

Now if the shock struck San Francisco at 5:18, the difference in time, 3:20 a. m., would correspond here, as there are two hours' difference in time.

I felt troubled, and worried over the affair, for I thought it the harbinger of some awful calamity which would soon befall our household, but my mind was set at ease when I heard of the terrible calamity in California.

JAMES J. HUNTER.

Leading Intellectual Lights.

They Express Their Respective Views in Reference to Commercial Mediumship.

To the Editor: The question raised by our good Sister Longley in The Progressive Thinker, No. 960, is a very important one to the Cause, both from an ethical and a legal standpoint. Mrs. Longley calls attention to her advertisement on page 8 of the same issue, from which we quote:

"Mrs. Mary T. Longley gives spiritual readings by mail, etc. Her guides give advice on mundane and spiritual affairs. Fee, one dollar."

In her letter she states: "Neither my guides or myself are in ANY sense 'fortune tellers.'" Later, she asks innocently: "Are we, then, to be dubbed 'fortune teller?'" As Shakespeare said: "THAT IS the question." ARE our religious workers when they advertise in this manner entitled to have that particular part of their work termed religious? Is it not a solicitation for REMUNERTIVE patronage? Can the most liberal or vivid imagination make anything else out of it? What was the advertisement placed for? Can the answer be anything else but—to get more one dollar patrons for readings, etc.? Is therefore the position taken by our good sister a logical one, either from an ethical or a legal standpoint? I am not asking these vital questions with a view to antagonizing Mrs. Longley, whom I esteem highly, neither am I desirous to stir up and arouse that narrow fanatical class who believe that mediums, because of their mediumship, make no mistakes, can do no wrong.

To me both as an individual student of Spiritualism and as an executive officer, the points involved are of vital importance, and for the future standing and position of our cause as an organized body MUST sooner or later be threshed out and settled in an intelligent and thorough manner.

Understand the point is not, do patrons get value received for their money? Is not, is the practice a legitimate one from a business standpoint? Is not, shall not our religious workers be properly supported? BUT, are such methods of obtaining support right and proper from an ethical point of view.

Also, are we honest with ourselves and the authorities when we claim exemption for them from the tax placed on non-religious or commercial professions?

To make the point still plainer, let us suppose that an orthodox Methodist minister inserted an advertisement in the papers wherein the statement was made that for one dollar per consultation both spiritual and material advice would be given. Let us suppose also that he claims exemption from the payment of a professional tax because of the fact that he was a Methodist minister. Would not his fellow-ministers of all denominations, the anti-orthodox (including the Spiritualists), and, in fact, all other professions cry out against this exemption? From here to Frisco the shouts of—commercial, worldly greed, unethical, unreligious, would be heard. We claim a higher ethical standard than that of our orthodox friends, is the claim a false one?

Legally, the question has several times to my knowledge been settled unfavorably. Two years ago in the case of the city of Seattle versus Rev. Mrs. Burleigh-Rice, Judge Albertson declared, "that IF fortune telling was part of the religious ceremonies of Spiritualism, the law would not protect them in the practice of it." Mrs. Rice, it is alleged, both advertised and had a sign out stating that business readings might be had within. Recently a medium, Mrs. Mary May by name, who pursued that same business, was arrested for non-payment of license here in St. Louis. She claimed membership with the Temple and said she was not a fortune teller but a religious medium. Judge Pollard, however, decided, that the evidence did not support her claim, and she was fined one hundred dollars. Los Angeles, I believe, had the same trouble, and the price of a license which all were required to have in order to give reading was raised to three hundred dollars. Two years ago our local mediums were visited because of an advertisement sanction by the editor in the now defunct "Temple News," and quite a good deal of argument was necessary to convince them that such was really the case. As State President the legal points involved were and are so important to our movement, that at the last annual convention I made the following recommendations: First, that a notice be printed defining our official position on religious and commercial mediumship and submitted the following:

"'For the protection of the public from commercial and fraudulent mediumship, the Progressive Spiritualist Association of Missouri desire to make the following statements:

"Mediums affiliated with the State Association are members of a religious body, regularly incorporated under the laws of the State, a chartered auxiliary of the National Spiritualists' Association, and are exercising their mediumistic gifts as part of a religious function. They endeavor, with the co-operation of excarnate intelligences, to PROVE the continuity of life, to comfort the mourner and by spiritual advice and consolation to uplift humanity.

"They DO NOT undertake to locate gold mines, buried treasures or lost animals.

"Give no tips on horse races or stock markets.

"Sell no charms, love powders or incense to remove evil influences. In other words, they DO NOT tell fortunes.

"No medium affiliated with the State Association has a sign out or advertises in the papers.

"Report violations of the above to Dr. Otto Vierling, State Secretary, 4555 Adkins avenue, St. Louis, Mo."

Second, that the practice of commercial mediumship as outlined shall be deemed sufficient cause for revocation of charter and expulsion from the State Association; all of which was adopted.

The Missouri State Board take the position that ONLY in their religious work shall our mediums be protected by the State Association.

Very sincerely yours,
PAUL McARTHUR.
2733 N. Spring avenue,
St. Louis, Mo.

Mrs. Mary T. Longley's Response.

To the Editor: An article penned for your beloved paper by my esteemed brother, Paul McArthur, the able president of the Missouri State Association, calls in question the methods and quality of the mediumistic work of the undersigned, as they are outlined in her standing card and in her late "Explanation" of them in The Progressive Thinker. Brother McArthur criticises these methods from an "Ethical and Legal Standpoint." He asks if my article in The Progressive Thinker was not intended as a solicitation for patronage, etc.? Why, yes, Mr. Editor, of course it was, and none but the blind or obtuse would dream it was for anything else, though candid readers will give me credit for honesty and fair dealing when I made the statement—which is literally true—that so many inquiries were coming to me as to my method and line of work I felt it essential to answer them all in The Progressive Thinker.

Our esteemed State President asks: "Are our religious workers when they advertise in this manner entitled to have that particular part of their work termed religious?"

I am not aware that my advertisement or my letter of "Explanation" uses the words religion or religious in letter or spirit. True I claim, what I can prove is true, to give spiritual advice; the advice and suggestions of my beloved inspirers are of and from the spiritual spheres, and I can bring thousands of honest, intelligent and pure-minded people from all over the States to bear witness to the veracity of this claim.

I commend Brother McArthur's article to the careful perusal of all who are interested in this much mooted subject. He calls attention to the incongruity it would be for an orthodox minister, or any other denominational preacher, to insert advertisements in papers that for one dollar he would give advice on both spiritual and mundane affairs. Well, I presume every ecclesiastical reverend is frequently called upon to render counsel to his parishioners, frequently on both mundane and spiritual personal matters. The difference is that his people are in his own parish; they support him liberally, pay him a living salary, in many cases supply him also with a house, rent free. He does not hesitate to accept his salary, also fees to any amount for special services, such as marriage ceremonies, etc., and if one of his parishioners who wanted advice from him on domestic or other affairs was wealthy and generous enough to give him a handsome sum for such service, I much doubt if he would refuse it. But I do not see that the cases are parallel. A minister has his own environment, church and people; his time and talents are for them exclusively. A medium is called to service by the denizens of the spirit world. Whenever they can reach with helpful counsel, they desire to do so. Said medium cannot give time, strength and mediumship for nothing. "The laborer is worthy of his hire," and must be fed, clothed and sheltered. He or she has no fat salary, no parish to uphold and support him or her.

From my positive knowledge the people at large do want just what genuine mediumship has to give, be it mundane advice on the perplexing matters of daily life, counsel for healing of disease and protection of health, or suggestions on matters pertaining to spiritual growth, and the conditions of life and well being of the dear, departed friends.

Perhaps I am a "commercial" medium, in the sense of receiving a fee for medial services, I am so, and so is every other medium of experience and usefulness. So is every clergyman who does not preach "without money and without price," a "commercial" minister. But every true and genuine medium gives repeatedly and freely to needy societies and to individual, public and private, service of unquestioned comfort and value, and if these were publicly recorded side by side with the beneficent deeds of the orthodox divines, I venture to say that they would shine forth as deeds unselfish and sweet—spiritual in essence and motive, and compare for quality with those of any established church.

We—all true mediums—are NOT fortune tellers. We do NOT "locate gold mines, buried treasures, or lost animals."

We "give no tips on horse races or stock markets."

We "sell no charms, love powders or incense to remove evil influences;" and we only have contempt for those who profess to do any of these things. In all of my forty years of mediumship I never give to my sitters, patrons or friends anything of the sort mentioned by the printed slip of the Missouri State Spiritualist Association. I have had a blessed acquaintance and friendship with hosts of pure and honest mediums from all over the country—many of them are now in the celestial country, aiding us by their love, sympathy, advice and blessing. None of them were "fortune tellers," none of them gave tips on horse racing, lotteries, etc., nor parted families, nor sold charms and love powders. They were benefactors to humanity; they comforted the sad, gave courage to the despondent, taught immortal truth. Thousands live to-day doing a good work, and they are not fortune tellers, but simply mediums of the spirit.

Just here allow me, Mr. Editor, to say I am glad of this opportunity to notify my recent patrons that their favors will be considered in their turn just as speedily as my guides and self can attend to them.

I have been blessed in receiving splendid testimony already since my return to this work after nine years, from a number of strangers, who write approvingly of the "readings" received. They assure me they have been comforted and blest by them. Some of these original letters are in the hands of the editor of The Progressive Thinker.

As long as my valued friends on both sides of life assure me this is my work, and while my strength and mediumship last I shall continue in it, and I defy our watchdogs in National and State organizations to prove such mediumship, its exercise and value as either illogical or unethical. I do not claim to give satisfaction in every case; no medium does; no doubt failure sometimes occuhs, but I know that all honorable mediums will return the fee to honorable people who give assurance that the message has failed or been incorrect.

If some of the applications I have received for this line of work, and for advice on mundane affairs as well as spiritual, could be made known, our censorious friends would be startled at the names of prominent and highly honored and noble Spiritualists appended thereto, and while such, as well as others less known, but equally respected, are in need of the work, mediums have no cause to question the source from which it springs. As for myself, I never give a reading but I inwardly and earnestly pray that it may be true, and of service, and carry a blessing with it. I know other mediums do likewise. MARY T. LONGLEY.

EIGHTH ANNUAL CONVENTION

Of the Wisconsin State Spiritualists' Association, at Portage, Wis.

The recent convention of the Wisconsin State Spiritualists' Association at Portage, April 21, 22, 23, was all that could reasonably be expected at a small town, with a busy farming community to draw from and orthodox and Catholic populace to depend on for an audience Business meetings were very poorly attended, but those with interest at heart sufficient to draw them from their homes, were earnest and enthusiastic in the work.

The first session was held Tuesday morning in a cold wave, necessitating the use of winter wraps.

President G. H. Brooks was in his chair, with Vice-President Mrs. C. McFarlin, and Miss Louise G. Loebel, Secretary, as his supports.

All delegates were deeply interested in the organization and its future work.

Mrs. Mattie E. Hull and Prof. A. J. Weaver were there in the interest of the Morris Pratt Institute, and Mattie gave many invocations and short and instructive talks, once under the control of Moses. Mr. Weaver gave an explicit and analytical lecture, which was one of the special features of the session.

Mrs. McFarlin did fine work with her beautiful recitations, invocations, addresses and trance readings.

President Brooks was not at his best, which would have been very surprising, considering his recent experiences, but he proved himself able to rise up out of the cloud and go on to a finish with the work before him.

Miss Loebel, the efficient secretary, was the busiest one of all early and late, in convention and out of it, but mastered the situation with an easy grace characteristic of her nature and earnestness in the work. Her minutes were always ready and her executive foresight in keeping track of the business was always in evidence.

Your reporter, being in attendance, and wishing to aid in every way in the work, was appointed assistant secretary, and took an active part in all the proceedings.

Reports from auxiliary societies showed a good healthy growth and continued interest in the movement, as well as the missionary work done by Mrs. McFarlin and the secretary, Miss Loebel, Mr. Brooks having been out of the State the greater portion of the year.

Greetings were received from the Illinois State Association, through its president, Dr. T. Wilkins; Mr. Bristol of Oakfield, and the Oakfield society; President Maxwell of the Minnesota State Association; G. W. Kates, Secretary of the N. S. A.; the Truthseekers Society, Milwaukee through Miss Loebel; the Pittsburg, Pa., Society, by Mr. Stevens, and Mr. Brooks; Whitewater Society by Mattie Hull; La-Crosse Society, by Mrs. C. McFarlin.

The President's report was an elaborate resume of the past year's progress and a series of important recommendations.

The Secretary's report was a recital of the past conditions, the present work and the future needs, as well as a financial statement.

The election resulted in placing in office, Geo. H. Brooks, president; Mrs. C. McFarlin, 1st vice-president; Mrs. E. F. Cowan, 2nd vice-president; Miss Louise G. Loebel, secretary; Mr. W. E. Bristol, treasurer; trustees, Dr. C. W. Sanderson, Mrs. G. E. Putnam, Mrs. Etta Bristol, Mr. E. D. Frost.

Delegates to the N. S. A. convention in 1909: G. H. Brooks, Miss L. G. Loebel, Mrs. C. McFarlin, Mrs. G. E. Putnam; alternates, Mrs. Hattie Smith, Mr. Wm. Smith, Mr. J. H. Houston, Mr. C. B. Parratt.

The next convention will be held in Milwaukee.

At the opening of the session Mayor Baker of Portage, delivered a short address of welcome, as follows:

"Mr. Chairman, Ladies and Gentlemen:—In extending to your convention the welcome of our city, permit me to say that Portage and its people are ever ready to invite within our borders all those who are worthy, be it an individual or an organization, and in welcoming your society, I extend to you a hearty welcome in behalf of our citizens, knowing as I do that you are engaged in the development and promotion of principles and teachings believed in and intended for the betterment of mankind.

"You will find our people hospitable and liberal, not only in extending to you the right hand of fellowship, but also in the discussion of principles and teachings calculated to improve the people in a material or a spiritual manner, and I doubt not that when your labors are ended and you return to your respective homes you will individually retain pleasant memories of your visit to our city.

"Hoping that your convention will be beneficial to you as a society and individually, I again greet you with a hearty welcome.'"

The message work was very satisfactorily done by Mrs. Paul Beuhler, of Minneapolis, Minn., and was certainly a drawing card for the convention. Her easy and graceful manner of public reading is an inspiration in itself, and she is doomed to hard work in this capacity for her accuracy.

Too much praise cannot be given Mrs. Nellie K. Baker for her energy in reporting the proceedings for the Portage daily paper, which was always published in full; also Mr. Ackers, for his energy in behalf of the meetings.

Thos Grimshaw and Dr. T. Wilkins, committee on resolutions offered resolutions upon the recent persecution of President Brooks; the efficient work accomplished by the W. S. S. A. in the past year; the recognition of mediumship as the foundation of Spiritualism; the equality of the sexes, politically, morally, socially and spiritually; the opposition to capital punishment; opposition to war and belief in arbitration; congratulating the Illinois friends upon the success of their efforts to have eliminated from the public press the advertisements of fortune-tellers and fakers, and lastly, the vote of thanks of the convention to the press of Portage for their excellent reports of our meetings.

Mattie E. Hull, A. J. Weaver, and Thos. Grimshaw, committee on president's report deploring the slight interest of auxiliaries, the burden of indebtedness, and hoping for a greater interest; endorsing the recommendations regarding the Morris Pratt Institute and Wonewoc Camp; touching upon missionary work, the location of mass-meetings wherever practicable; deploring the lack of interest in Lyceum work, and recommending the hearty support of the spiritualistic press.

After the last tone of the President's voice was sounded in dismissing and the final invocation heard, a goodly crowd, upon that Thursday evening, were invited to the home of Mrs. Nellie K. Baker and husband, to partake of as sumptuous a feast of good things as ever was sampled by mortals, and ice cream thrown in.

DR. T. WILKINS.

GREETINGS.

Read by the author, President I. S. S. A., to the Wisconsin State Association in convention at Portage.

While all nature seems awaking from a sleep of Winter's chill,
And the animals are mating and the birds are bill to bill;
While the sun is moving northward and the days are growing long,
And the very air resounding with vibrating chirp and song,
We have met here in the spirit to commune and feast and love,
And to revel in the sweetness of the

Here's to all a happy greeting from your near-by sister state;
Here's to all Wisconsin workers who are making their cause great;
Here's to idlers only pity, for the work they fail to do
They will find before them waiting to be done beyond the blue;
Then be staunch while in the mortal,
and be full of do and dare,
While the cause is needing workers
it is time to do your share.

Let each lay aside his grunting and lamenting and begin
To be partner in the pushing and of pulling people in.
Let each person have a mission and an object close in view,
And to all he deems as sacred hold
most loyally and true;
Let him raise his head up sunward and absorb its mighty light;
And send up an invocation for true justice, love and right.

Let us reach across the border and be neighborly and kind
To each other, and united be in spirit and in mind;
Let us keep in close communion with our friends in other lands;
Let us have exchange of knowledge of the things the world demands;
Let us hustle in the labor of uniting as a whole
Into one grand working body for uplift ment of the soul.

Let the spirits of the masters in the higher wisdom sphere
Guide our actions in the labors for the true religion here;
Let us move up closer to them as they reach a helping hand,
And endeavor to unite them with our blessed angel band;
Let us work for human beings who are striving hard to grow,
And the angel hosts will aid us as the ages come and go.

DR. T. WILKINS.

THE OPENING LEAVES.

Once more has nature broken winter's bonds,
And opening leaves and buds in gentle tones
Are telling all their secrets, strange and sweet,
Unfolding all their beauty in the air.
Go forth, oh! herald of the tender Spring,
And tell to all the world that waiting bends
A listening ear, that there's a hidden sign
And pregnant meaning in the opening leaves
And buds unfolding in their tender bloom.
And thus the herald's voice rings clear and true;
"Know ye, oh! mortals, who with careless feet
Are trampling on the daisies in the field,
And without e'en a glance pass by as lilies bloom,
Or turn with cold disdain from Spring's sweet smile
And do no reverence at fair nature's shrine,
That e'en the golden sheen of monarch's robe,
Bedecked with jewels rich and rare indeed,
Reflecting sunlight rays cannot compare
With opening leaves and buds, when to the air
The Spring is giving all her richness forth
And tinting all the world with tender bloom.
The opening leaves, how silently they move,
The opening buds, how quietly they give Their fragrance—and their beauty to to the world.
'Tis thus the souls of men in time unfold,
Who strive to climb the steep and rocky slopes
To where the beauty of the Spirit's power
Unfolds, and shows to them the shining star
That leads them to their far-off golden day."

ETNA, WASHINGTON.

Letter From the Medium, Henry B. Allen.

We are still living in Etna, working out little ranch, and also doing what we can in a quiet way to help along the Cause of Spiritualism. We have not been away from our home for nearly three years, though have had many calls, but I am always willing and glad to hold circles for any who wish to visit us with an earnest desire to investigate, and I find I can have better results in our own home than I can while traveling and holding seances in all sorts of rooms and before all classes of people. We, a few of us here, have our circles, socials, meetings, etc., and are getting along nicely.

After our camp meeting last season we saw the necessity of a hall. My wife and I talked the matter over and decided that a spiritual Temple we must have here in Etna; but how were we to build it? was the next thing. We made all sorts of plans to raise the funds, and finally concluded that if we wanted the temple the best way was to go at it and build it ourselves. So we started in, and we now have on our fine camp ground a nice building, 30x70 feet, with a fine stage, a first-class floor, and everything in good shape for our camp meeting, or any other meeting we may wish to have. We hope to have meetings every Sunday; also a children's Lyceum in connection with our hall. We have a restaurant capable of seating fifty, and own our own dishes, so we feel quite independent.

We celebrated the sixtieth anniversary, and had a pleasant time, all taking our dinner in the grove, and had music, recitations, also lectures appropriate for the occasion by A. P. Avery and E. Cochran. On the 1st, 2d and 3d of May we will hold a meeting, and dedicate our hall to Spiritualism. We expect to have Daniel Hull and other speakers with us, and have a royal spiritual feast. We have our own cornet band; in fact, we have everything necessary for our meetings, but we do need a few more good Spiritualists here, and there is plenty of room. We have a healthy, mild climate, pure spring water, fine mountain scenery, and as good soil as can be found anywhere; no better fruit country in the world, and land is cheap here now, and a man with five or ten acres can do better and with less work than with a hundred in the East. I know for I have tried both.

A steamboat makes three trips a week up the river past our place, making it easy to ship to market. Some of you good people who have become tired of the long, cold winters East, come out and see what a beautiful country and climate we have here.

Our next annual camp meeting will commence on Saturday, August 1, and will continue through the entire month. We will have the best speakers and mediums that we can possibly get, and I would like to correspond with any that would like to be with us.

Anniversary in Portland, Ore.

The Oregon State Spiritualists' Association celebrated the sixtieth anniversary of Modern Spiritualism in an all-day meeting, Sunday, March, 29, in the Auditorium hall. This day of days will long be remembered, for many pleasing features connected with it, it being the first time in the history of the State Association that an effort was made to identify itself as a State celebration. Our hall was most beautifully decorated with potted ferns, reminding one of a large flower garden.

Promptly at 10:45 a. m. our hall was filled to overflowing. The music was prepared by a specialist, Mrs. F. M. Branch, who introduced Miss Emily Hampson, contralto of great fame, and Mrs. Perry Walton, accompanist. Both deserve great praise.

Our home talent, Mrs. Mabel Wilson and Miss Leola Struble, are also worthy of great praise.

The president, Mrs. Sophia B. Seip, gave the opening address. Many beautiful lessons were given all through the address. Much stress was given especially to the necessity of co-operation and a more thorough organization of Spiritualists.

Short speeches then being in order, an old veteran Spiritualist, Col. C. A. Reed, set the ball to rolling, which was kept going by many radiant souls.

Five minutes to one o'clock, our eloquence was hushed by the entrance of about sixty white-robed little children, with an order to escort our congregation to the banquet, four blocks up Third street. These little tots, conducted by Mrs. Coon, raised their flags, led the large assembly through our streets two by two, and formed an arch at the entrance where all passed through to the tables set in the hall of the First Spiritualist Society, where the Ladies' Aid and State Association jointly had prepared something for the inner man. This whole affair was specially gotten up to remind these little ones of their helpfulness, an act which will long be remembered by them.

The afternoon program opened at 2:30 p. m. Many returned to our our hall, where we found nearly every seat taken, all moving like a magic ring. Our Brother Barrett was in town, but we did not have the pleasure of greeting him at our festive occasion, but had the extreme pleasure of introducting our brother, Mr. Ira Taylor, who has great oratorical fame. Following his address, our sister, Mrs. Campbell, sang in her usual spirit, "Christ is Walking on the Waters." There are so many who deserve special mention. Our afternoon was a feast of good things.

Mrs. Laura Share, the president of the "Spiritual Temple Fund," spoke with much feeling, showing her effort to enlist helpers to raise means to erect a "temple" in Portland, Ore. Already has this association raised considerable money. The Temple Fund Association is incorporated under the laws of Oregon, and does not belong to any ONE society, but will erect its "dome" that ALL may enter with the same equal privileges.

Should any reader wish to communicate with the president you can address Mrs. Laura F. Share, 283 Failing street, Portland, Ore. Our afternoon service closed with spirit messages by Mrs. Wilson, Mrs. Congdon and others.

The evening services commenced at 7:45 p. m. Long before that hour, although a driving rain, there were no seats left empty, and at the hour named for opening, standing room was at a premium, and hundreds turned away. Our State Missionary, Mrs. M. A. Congdon, was our leading speaker for the evening, followed by Mrs. Virginia Rowe, State Vice-president.

A more satisfactory victory for Spiritualist in song, speech and silence has never been witnessed.

REV. SOPHIA B. SEIP,
President Oregon State Spiritualists' Association.

VISIT OF MY FATHER.

As I sat in the silence one evening,
No mortal to speak to or see,
There came a vision; and its meaning
Was very consoling to me.

He told me, "Be cheerful and patient;
The spiritual growth never dies;
It might be held curbed and hampered,
But its light shall shine forth in the skies."

He said, "Child, do not falter nor weary;
In doing your duty by all;
Remember the boatman will ferry
The weary away at his call.

"Child, I come to greet you,
And drive away the gloom.
Dwell not upon the mortal,
But give the spirit room.

"Hold to the truth, my daughter,
Of the knowledge you have gained,
Tho' efforts may be crushed in the mortal,
In spirit you'll not be restrained."

How I love, as I sit in the silence,
To know that my friends are near;
I see them and sense their presence,
And their well-known voices I hear.

SPIRITUALISM—Progress, the Universal Law of Nature; Thought, the Solvent of Her Problems.—SPIRITUALISM

VOL. 38 CHICAGO, ILL., MAY 16, 1908 NO. 964

Dr. Beale and Spiritualism.

A Critical Review of His Statements, by the Editor-at-Large.

Editor Milwaukee Sentinel: As editor-in-chief of the National Spiritualists' Association of the United States of American and Dominion of Canada, I have been asked to reply to the remarks of Rev. C. H. Beale, pastor of the Grand Avenue Congregational church in Milwaukee, in his sermon on Easter Sunday. I respectfully request a portion of your valuable space in which to make that reply in a non-controversial spirit. Dr. Beale said several kind things of Spiritualism, for which the conscientious followers of that movement will most heartily thank him. It is to his sweeping assertions that it can never be soul-satisfying, nor become a real religion, to which exception must be taken.

If Dr. Beale has never studied Spiritualism from its religious aspect, he could make that statement through a misconception of the real purpose and meaning of the great movement whose work he thus decries. Spiritualism, as a religion, is predicated upon the solid rock of Theism. To the enlightened Spiritualist, the Infinite is the All-In-All. Life IS, and because life IS, all forms of finite life exist. "Pneuma ho Theos" of the New Testament is a truism to the Spiritualist. "Spirit is God;" "God made man in His own image," says the Bible. It therefore follows that the REAL MAN is the SPIRITUAL MAN, MAN THE SOUL, hence the SOUL is God's image. Is there not real comfort in the mighty truth that the soul is God's IMAGE, the child of Infinite Life?

Spiritualism, through the above teachings, gives man a knowledge of the Infinite, by demonstrating the All-In-All of Life. It proves that, Life being Infinite, man cannot get outside of Life. As Life is all-inclusive, it must be God; it therefore follows that man is never outside of nor away from God. All men are children of the same Infinite parentage, hence brothers in this lower life of ours. Is it not soul-satisfying to have the knowledge of the kinship of the race made known to the denizens of earth? Is it not true religion that enables one man to find his own good in the good of all men? Is it not religious to follow Jesus of Nazareth when He says, "Love thy neighbor as thyself?" Spiritualism emphasizes the words of the reformers of all ages in asserting the sunny gospel, "All for each, and each for all."

Again, if Life be Infinite, if it be impossible to get outside of or away from Life, it follows that there is no such thing as "Death" in this world of ours. What seems death is but change. With men, it is the withdrawal of the REAL man, the SOUL-MAN, from his dominancy over and use of the physical body, to enable him to take the next progressive upward step on the ladder of being. The body disintegrates, but the real man rises out of decaying material substance, like the butterfly from its chrysalis, into the broad, boundless freedom of the supernal world. Is it not soul-satisfying, heart-comforting and sustaining to know that our loved ones live beyond the grave? Spiritualism has revealed this helpful truth to the world through its demonstration of the universality of Life.

The phenoment of Spiritualism do introduce a scientific feature into its teachings, but those phenomena are not the all of Spiritualism, any more than the phenomena H_2O are the all of chemistry. All of the applied sciences owe their existence to phenomena. Those phenomena challenged the attention of the thoughtful minds among men, and inspired them to analyze, classify, and reduce to orderly form the myriad facts, found in the so-called material world. The phenomena of Spiritualism are likewise the effects of causes, and they bid sentient beings to search out those causes. The result of the researches thus far made in this special field, is the science of psychology which is now only in its infancy. Every psychic phenomenon, when put to the most crucial test, reveals the fact that it is caused by an intelligent force—not by the combination of co-relations of unthinking atoms of matter.

In the last analysis, each psychic phenomenon asserts and proves that it is the product of intelligent action on the part of a human entity that has survived the change called death. This entity not only demonstrates its survival over death and the grave, but it also proves its identity. Every mortal by witnessing it, or by studying it, can come into direct communion with some loved one who has taken leave of earth. Is it not soul-satisfying, comforting and inspiring to know that father, mother, wife, husband, children, friends, most dear, have survived the change called death and are living in a happier, better world from which they are able to send messages of love and encouragement to those whom they have left on earth?

Every message from those "within the Veil," to the denizens of earth is freighted with love and good-will. "Be good! Do good! Think good! Think purely! Speak truly! Live nobly!" are some of the commands from the "land-o'-the-leal." The unseen ones emphasize the law of consequences and its impartial application to every living being. There is no escape from the consequences of wrong doing, or evil thinking. Each man must pay the price in full for his every ignoble deed or thought. Forgiveness is not bestowed upon the undeserving. It must be earned, and the only one qualified to pardon is the one who commits the sin. He must work out his error to the uttermost. Is there not something that is soul-satisfying in the truth that man must live right and do right if he would be happy in the hereafter? Is it not an incentive to nobler living and cleaner thinking to realize that each mortal must work out his own destiny, must face himself throughout all eternity, must atone for his own misdeeds?

Surely good Dr. Beale must have overlooked these wholesome truths, these salutary religious impresses and influences that Spiritualism gives to the world. A movement that demonstrates a loving Father-Mother as the Creator of the universe, that teaches the brotherhood of man, that there is no death for man the Soul, that proves open communion between the seen and unseen spheres, and holds that right living, clean thinking and loving, unselfish service are stepping stones to happiness here and hereafter, cannot be other than soul-satisfying to mankind, through its influence as a religion.

Very truly yours,
HARRISON D. BARRETT.

MESSAGE FROM SPIRIT LIFE.

Communication From a Spirit Who Could Not Realize He was Dead.

I am going to tell you about my first visit to your earth sphere. It was while I was gaining strength after my departure from physical life, that the thought occurred to me that there were others yet in the mortal to whom I might come with assurances that there was also a place here for them, and that once in this life there would be no perpetual parting, as it had been on earth. I had seen so many progress from the earth to these spheres and I mourned them as gone from me forever.

Well, I did desire my friends to be aware of the fact that I returned with the express purpose of convincing them of this grand truth—life after so-called death—and when I first came into the presence of mortal mankind, I felt relief that I was no longer in the body myself. I had held to it so long that there would be, that there could be, no happiness after so-called death, provided there was any future. Now I saw these mortals toiling and presuming to be conscious of their fate. I saw them placing great obstacles in their own path. I saw them struggle fruitlessly to amass wealth with the express purpose of giving it to the church and the priest as they were to shrive and in other ways condone with them, and to provide for the future welfare of their children. I saw all this and more, and I seemed to feel a great relief that I was no longer on the earth, as a struggling, crawling, superstitious creature.

Now you will desire to know what I gained by this visit. Need I tell you all it did for me in the way of relieving that regret at the change I had been obliged to make? I was consciously existing as much so as ever; I could not profit more than by the change I had made from the earth to these spheres. I am now aware of the fact that more new arrivals have experienced the great desire to visit again the scenes of their departure, and after such visits, are reconciled that such change was made. They regard death then as a necessary blessing into which all sooner or later must come. If one but knew at the time that this ordination of death, so-called, has been given as a blessing, and as a promotion to us, it would receive the proper appreciation by all.

Be sure that I am reconciled as who would not be after having suffered promotion? It is true that many do not immediately know the certainty of their condition upon arrival here. These we approach with caution.

Let me relate a little incident that befell one of our number since we were last with you. There was a mortal who was endowed with with strength and who suffered no ill-health till that which caused his final release from the body. He saw the necessity of procuring medical aid; nay, he at last demanded it, and when it was forthcoming, did not consult the physician as to the true nature of his disease and its probable outcome. When he was finally given a new lease of life by having been obliged to cast off the worn old material body which had served out its allotted time, he continued to presume that there was nothing ailing him; that he was sound, strong, and well. He made active preparation to continue his former work, and when he was controlled by the physician here, to remain calm and restful till his powers should assert themselves, he grew very abusive, and then our control was necessitated to lay severe restrictions upon his actions. This he was strong enough to discern; and he grew almost unmanageable till we took him back to his former home so lately deserted. You may fancy his chagrin upon our entrance to be brought face to face with his worn-out old body. This was certainly a puzzle. He was mystified. While he recognized that it was his body, he was sore perplexed. We held him before it for a long time till his reasoning powers were drawn upon, and his mind begun to grasp the reality of the situation. Indeed, he was at first inclined to think it a mere hallucination,—this body of his,—while he stood regarding it so intently and occasionally glancing at those who mourned him as dead. This still perplexed him greatly. At last he begun to demand an explanation of us. He declared we were imposing some fraud upon him in the shape and semblance of his own body. He declared that he did not die, nor had he left the earth for any other abode. He claimed to be himself as he ever was;—but the body! He could not account for that. So we allowed him to remain for a time, during which the minister was already taking his position to disseminate the virtues of the late departed, and we hoped in the meantime, that our late charge would, through these obsequies, finally realize the truth, since he deemed us mere perpetrators of fraud upon his credulity. We could do nothing for him so long as he held this opinion of us, nor could we convince him of his position; the only way open to us was to allow him to be a respectful auditor of his own virtues as they were recounted impressively at his own funeral.

This we did, and the outcome met with entire satisfaction. The late departed became reconciled to his new position. He demanded nothing of us but what we saw fit to give him in the way of progressive thought.

Now, what I wished to relate for your delectation, was his account of that burial service. He said (and I would better give it you in his own words): "I am an old man. I have seen and heard much, but I never in my whole life on that green earth, heard the like of lies told by that fellow who held forth to those mourners. I never should have believed it. And there they were, I have no doubt, believing every word he said about my good qualities, and then to think the lies—all, all lies! He said I was DEAD! I am NOT dead? If I'm dead, dead is the wrong word. Life ought to be the word to substitute the word death. O, the folly of it all! To think that I spent eighty years in that old body, and never thought but that one is dead, when he DIES! I never once thought that one could still live, though dead! I let myself think a man's dead when he's dead. I was mistaken in the word. It should have been, when a man dies he LIVES, yes LIVES! But it is all over now, and what shall I do without my earthly interests? I shall surely die now without them, for they did serve to clinch me to that old body. I could not have endured the eighty years without the interests I had in life. Now I am dead, ha! ha! I must have something—". At this point his controls deemed it a wise policy to quiet the restless spirit, and to begin with, he was removed, and put to sleep where he was obliged to remain for some time, till his newfound interest would not tax his sensitiveness too severely and here we leave him for the present.—Spirit communication through A. DEFIES CLERGY TO SHOW AUTHENTICITY OF BIBLE.

Excommunicated French Modernist Publishes Volume of Letters Exchanged With Prelates on Catholicism.

Abbe Loisy, of Paris, the most celebrated of the French modernists, who has just published a volume of letters of the clergy between 1903 and 1908. In a letter to Abbe Bricourt, the editor of the "Review of the French Clergy," he says:

"I defy you to prove the historical authenticity of the Scriptures on which are founded the apologetics of Catholicism as officially exposed by the council of the Vatican. The council speaks of miracles and predictions which Moses, the prophets and especially Christ made in abundance and which constitute the surest and clearest proofs of divine revelation. I defy you to show me a single passage of either Testament which contains a definite prediction, incontestably realized.

"I defy you to show me an indubitable miracle sufficiently authenticated to be cited as irrefutable proof of the Jewish or Christian religion. I defy you to prove the formal institution of the church of Christ. I defy you to prove by Christ's authentic teachings the revelation of the fundamental dogmas of traditional Christianity. I defy you to prove the divine institutions of the sacraments."

In another letter to Henri de Bout, laureat of the French Academy and cure of the Sacred Heart, he says:

"The ecclesiastical decrees which have from time to time, sometimes brutally, been heaped upon me, and which have given me a sad reputation in very Catholic circles, cause me no irritation. I am tranquilly pursuing the road which leads to the common end of all mortals, and I console myself for the apparent nonsuccess of my life with the thought that nothing is entirely lost in this world."

THE LIFE AFTER THIS.

As Vividly Portrayed by Harper's Bazar.

We all know in a general way that what is called psychical research has occupied itself for now many years with the mysteries of the silent world. Perhaps few of us know the extent to which such studies have been carried, or the importance of the men who have been engaged in them. Among these, on both sides of the sea, are strong thinkers, honored scholars, not a few of them persons already distinguished—like Sir William Crookes—in the world of physical science, and therefore doubly entitled to attention and to confidence.

Quietly, patiently, courageously, these men have pursued a course of investigation as thorough as that which gave to Darwin the great discovery of his life. The perplexities of telepathy, the history of apparitions, the question of a thinking and feeling world beyond our own, the arguments for and against the existence of the conscious and communicating dead—these are no longer left to tellers of ghost stories at ignorant and shuddering firesides. Such speculatins have become the business of men, the occupation of scholars and enthusiasts. Up to this point it cannot perhaps he said that the continuance of personality after death is demonstrated to the satisfaction of the pugnaciously skeptical—very likely it could never be—but it is not too much to assert that this tremendous hypothesis is already scientifically recommended to any mind that is no unwilling to accept it.—Harper's Bazar.

TRUTH ABOUT MEDIUMS.

Perfectly Healthy People Often Possess Abnormal Powers.

I have had a good deal of experience with mediums, and I've come to the conclusion that they all start with at least some small basis of abnormal power. Is it not rather suggestive that the number of practicing mediums does not materially increase? If it were a mere matter of deception would there not be thousands at the trade? As a matter of fact, there are not fifty advertising mediums in New York at this moment, though of course the number is kept down by the feeling that it is a bit disreputable to acknowlege possession of these powers.

There are nice ones. My own mother had this power in her youth, so my father tells me. Her people were living in Wisconsin at the time and the settlers from many miles around came to see her perform. An uncle, when a boy of four, did automatic writing, and an aunt recently wrote to me in relation to my book, "The Tyranny of the Dark," that for two years (beginning when she was about seventeen) these powers of darkness made her life a hell. There are many decent people who are possessed by strange forces, but are shy of confessing their abnormalities. Ask your family physician. He will tell you that he always has at least one patient who is troubled by occult powers. They call it "hysteria," which doesn't explain anything. Many apparently healthy people possess the more elementary of these powers—often without knowing it.—Hamlin Garland in April Everybody's Magazine.

LIFTING THE VEIL.

And Disclosing the Beauty and Grandeur of the Spirit Realms.

How kind we ought to be to our true and honest mediums, both physical and inspirational, who have devoted the better part of their lives in earnest endeavor to give to earth's children the truths of spirit return, giving their strength and vitality day by day that man might know and doubt no longer that there is a spiritual life to live after the change called death.

Through our mediums spirits wise in the wisdom of the ages, can enlighten our minds on many important themes, and answer many questions that arise in the mind of man to puzzle and bewilder him as he strives to know something of spiritual things. People have been heard to remark, "If spirit return is true what good does it do?"

It seems to me that is a question, if answered in all its fullness, would fill a volume so large "one might read and never read through."

Laying aside the wonders it has performed for the benefit of mankind by influencing minds to perform wonders in scientific achievements, it has fulfilled a mission of love to sorrowing souls by its blessed assurance that loving hearts separated by the change called death shall again be reunited in a land where parting shall be no more.

Oh! blessed knowledge, worth more to a sorrowing soul than all the wealth and glory of kings.

A little child of earth passed out from the mortal life to live among the angels; a fond mother sits weeping over the tiny form on which her forndest hopes had been centered; weary and sad-eyed she saw it placed in its tiny casket and hid from her mortal sight.

Other children in time came to bless and cheer that home, but the memory of that first little one never faded from the heart of mother. Her mortal life was lengthened even till her hair was whitened, her eyes dim, her form weak and trembling. One by one her friends and loved ones passed over the river. Fnally she, too, was called to lay aside the worn out physical form, and be born into the glorious spirit lands.

Willingly she obeyed the summons, for she longed to meet again the loved ones gone before her, and clasp to her heart once more the form of her tiny babe, gone there many years.

She had been taught to believe that her child still remained a tiny babe, and as such would be restored to her loving arms. When the hour of her transition took place and her spirit had been clothed upon with the spotless white robes of immortal beauty, she saw many loved faces there to greet her; loving hands clasped her own and tokens of affection greeted her in lavish profusion, but in the midst of all these tender greetings, she felt a void, for no one came and placed in her arms the little babe she longed to see. Where was it?

As if in answer to her unspoken desire, a beautiful spirit with loving smile, and radiant face, came swiftly forward and said:

"Dear lady, why that anxious look?"

She replied: "I want my child, the little babe that went from me to this land so long ago. Why is she kept from me?"

"Come with me, and I will find the child for thee."

Gladly the mother consented and the two walked away together.

"Let us sit on this mossy bank while I tell you something," she said. "I came to the spirit world while a tiny babe; a loving spirit mother has cared for me; loving guides have been my teachers, and I have grown to womanhood in this beautiful land. Little children grown in the spirit world from babyhood to maturity, becoming beautiful in spirit, and often messengers of light to souls in darkness. You will in time learn all these laws."

"How shall I know my child if she has grown to womanhood?"

"Each soul shall know its own. Your child will know you, for she has been often with you during your stay on earth, and has waited for your coming to spirit life all these years."

"Where is she?" tremblingly said the mother.

"Look at me! Behold your child!"

"My child!" and the mother clasped the radiant vision to her heart, and both experienced the rapture of united love, which no earthly pen could adequately describe.

To her home the lovely child took her mother, and in her sweet companionship she was happy—more happy than she could have been had she found her child a tiny babe. Rejoicing through the eternal ages that the loving Father's wisdom had made all things to work in harmony, that all the minds of his children were provided for, and so bring them happiness forever and forever. At this mother found her child in the radiant angel who came to meet her, so will all mothers find their loved ones in the bright beyond.

Is Spiritualism any good to humanity? Yes, my friends, Spiritualism came to teach the beautiful lesson for a comfort to mankind, that death cannot rob you of your loved ones, let them go when they will.

In the morn of life, in the flush of, manhood or womanhood, or in the decline of life, they will be waiting for you, watching for you, and hasten to greet you, rejoicing in your coming. All the loved of earth shall sometime be re-united. In the light of Modern Spiritualism, death is robbed of its sting.

The grave can claim no victory, for it is the door through which the spirit is born; the glorious destiny of man to die to earth, to be born to immortality. MRS. JAS. W. RILEY.

MATERIALIZATION.

Excellent Proof That Under Certain Circumstances It Is Possible.

About twenty-three years ago, five of my best friends and I concluded to thoroughly investigate so-called spirit return—not for notoriety, money, or anything save to learn and know the truth. We agreed to meet Wednesday and Sunday nights, sharp at the appointed hour, and to let nothing prevent, over which we had control. Well, we continued this work for two and a half years. Three of our number were physicians, but we provided for our patients beforehand, and if new ones applied during the seance hour, and could not wait, they were requested to go elsewhere. I speak of this that you may see that we were in earnest.

We were all convinced of the truth of spirit return, having varied phenomena of great merit, but as this article deals exclusively with materialization, I will speak of that only. For a time we had no evidence of this kind. Finally we heard of one who was said to be good in this phase of mediumship, for whom we sent, and he came.

He had held seances every night for two weeks, and gave daily readings. We suggested that he rest a few days, but he said, "No." he was "Ready."

The first night we had the seance in my office, which was not at all satisfactory. Then he did rest for a few days, and we again met in the same place, and had very good results, which enraged the orthodox people, who promptly arrested him, but when the evidence was all in for the prosecution, the judge dismissed the case on the ground, "No cause for action."

After a few more days of rest, I was told from the spirit side to go and ask the medium to give a seance under the following test conditions, which he did:

At this time I had just finished building a very strong and solid house. The walls were plastered, but the parlors were entirely unfurnished, except shades for the windows and our test seance was held there. Also, just at this time a man advertised to expose so-called spirit phenomena in the opera house. We were told to let him come to our to our seance. I procured an entire black suit of clothes for the medium's mother (who attended him in his work), as some claimed she had white goods under her dress, which the medium dragged out and under the curtain during his seance.

On the appointed evening we met, and four men took the medium into a room and stripped him of all clothing, then wrapped him in a sheet and brought him into the seance room. Meanwhile we had hung up two strips of canton flannel across the solid corner of the room, and put one wooden chair behind the curtain, and had taken the mother into another room, dressed her in complete black, and keeping all her own clothes under lock and key. While this was being done, the sitters repeatedly examined the cabinet, as they call it, the Opera house man crawling around and around on his hands and knees, pounding the wall and floor, and closely inspecting the chair, but at last declared with others that he was satisfied "so far," and we put a lamp in the back parlor, but had a reflector on a suspended lamp in the front parlor in front of the cabinet, turning a strong light on the openings of the curtain in front. I forgot to say that after the number invited had arrived, every door and window in the house was closed and securely fastened. The medium came in enveloped in the sheet, sat down in front of us, and was at once entranced. then passed behind the curtain, and instantly the sheet was pitched out over the top of the curtain, while a voice audible to all said: "We do not want this sheet in here, for to-morrow they will say that we made dresses of it."

The room was so light that all could be seen, and tell the time by their watch.

Twenty-seven people came out in course of the evening, frequently two and three at a time, while the medium, some of the time, stood with his head thrust out at the side, talking to the sitters close to him. The men who materialized were with one exception, in full dress suits of black, coats mostly of "Prince Albert" style, cuffs. One man was dressed in blue with white linen shirt-fronts and cuffs. One man was dressed in blue uniform with brass buttons. The women were clad in white. My spirit brother-in-law, Thomas Buckle, the English historian, came out, bowed to the company, then came to me, took my arm and we walked around the room in front of the people in the strong light, he talking all the time. The opera man, trembling with fear, said he had no more to say, and left town on the midnight train. All were astonished, but satisfied with the truth of materialization. Besides the full-grown people who materialized, there were children from infants in arms up to grown people.

I am sorry to say that after this beautiful demonstration, this very medium was caught in unquestionable fraud after leaving our town; not because he liked to cheat, I think, but because he had learned to be very extravagant, and he could not produce genuine phenomena sufficient to sustain such habits, and so gave daily readings and seances, and "faked" when necessary "to carry out his program.

He is now in the spirit world, and I suppress his name.

After he left us, we resumed our private sittings, and one of our number in trance, told us to get a tablet and put on the stand. One of us went out to a store, bought one, and placed it on the stand, around which we sat, while the one in trance sat behind the curtain about eight feet away. Soon a humming sound was plainly heard in the tablet, while the stand trembled. In a short time, a hand visible to all come out over the top of the curtain, tore a leaf from the tablet and gave to each one of us, on which was written a message with juice of my geraniums growing in the room, for ink. Some were written in red from the blossoms, and some in green from the leaves. They said: "When you come to our side, you will see how very simple this is." They also said: "You wonder how the table is made to tip in answer to questions. Look and see!" Then a hand and arm, as plain to see as our own, but the color of electric light, came, took hold of the stand, tipped and pushed it about with none of our hands touching it.

At another time, we had changed the night of meeting, and all forgot it except the trance medium, who came. I remarked that this was our first failure. He said: "Well, I will sit behind the screen over there, and perhaps we can get something." I said, "They can do nothing with just I, alone, here;" but he said, "It will do no harm to try," and with that he crossed the room, put a chair behind the screen and sat down. I smiled to myself, for I thought he would wait for nothing. Imagine my surprise, when after a very short time out stepped a girl of about fourteen years, who had passed to spirit life the year before, and whom I knew well, and at once recognized. She also brought two little tots with her; then the medium came out, still in trance, and said: "You thought nothing could be done with so few, but much more can be done with a few who are in harmony, than with many who are inharmonious. Remember, perfect harmony in a good cause is a tremendous power. I could give more data, but feel that this is sufficient.

I hope the time will come when our people will see that commercial traffic cannot be made out of spirit return.

VERIFY THE FACTS.

Mr. Carrington's Article.

To the Editor: Permit me to state that at the time I wrote my review of Mr. Carrington's report, published in your valuable journal, May 2, 1908, I had not seen his special chapter dealing with his experiences with the well-known medium, P. L. O. A. Keeler. What I said in my review I stand by to-day, and at all times, but it is only just to Mr. Keeler and myself to state that I did not refer to him even indirectly in the article in question, for I did not know anything whatever regarding Mr. Carrington's sittings with him, when my review was written. About ten days after my manuscript had been mailed, I received a copy of Part I., Vol. II., of the Proceedings of the American Society for Psychical Research, in which I found Mr. C.'s extended references to Mr. Keeler. I cannot at this time review this portion of Mr. Carrington's very able report. At some future time I may have something to say. I may be permitted to state, however, that I was greatly surprised and shocked at what I found in this special chapter. Mr. Carrington's results from his slate-writing seances with Mr. Keeler are so widely different from my own that I feel constrained to analyze mine anew, compare methods, contrast evidences and then draw such conclusions as the classified facts will warrant. I refer only to Mr. Keeler's slate-writing phase of mediumship. I have never attended one of his seances for materialization, and only three or four of his seances for physical phenomena in the light. I am not a competent witness in regard to either one of the two phases. It is no reflection upon Mr. Keeler to say that I think Mr. Carrington has done our movement a great deal of good in publishing his famous Report. It will make all Spiritualists more careful in their methods of testing phenomena, and will cause all mediums, who are mediums, to avoid everything that could by any possibility be interpreted as fraud or trickery. Miss Lizie Doten (recently returned to the soul-world) once said to me, "You cannot go back on your own experiences any more than I can, but WE MUST BOTH VERIFY OUR FACTS!" These words of our greatest poetss and one of our ablest lecturers, well apply to us all. Mr. Carrington cannot go back upon his experiences, and he always seeks to verify his facts. Mr. Keeler and all of his many friends cannot go back upon their experience, and if they have not verified their facts, they now have a splendid opportunity to do so. Inference should never be mistaken for evidence, nor appearances accepted as demonstrated facts.

Yours for Spiritualism,
HARRISON D. BARRETT.

PROMINENT LOUISIANA WOMAN

In the death of Mrs. Caroline E. Merrick, of New Orleans, Louisiana loses one of her foremost citizens and the cause of woman suffrage throughout the country loses one of its ablest advocates and most consistent supporters. Mrs. Merrick was a close friend of Susan B. Anthony in the days when the woman suffrage question counted comparatively few adherents in the South. At the National convention of suffragists held in New Orleans in 1903, Mrs. Merrick shared with Miss Anthony all the honors.

Mrs. Merrick was a figure of interest at the National Woman Suffrage convention in Baltimore in 1906, which was the last she attended, and it was during this meeting that Miss Anthony was stricken with the illness which ended in her death a month later.

SOUL DEVELOPMENT.

Trenchant and Impressive Remarks in Regard to the Same.

I desire to give just a few hints or suggestions as to the development of the human soul, which development is the most important thing in all the world. It has been the urgent cry of all ages. Sages and saviors taught it; the early fathers impressed it upon the minds of the race in more ways than one. The poets sing it, and to-day we are realizing it more than ever before—the importance of developing soul power, which is immortality.

The race to-day is but well started on its long journey of evolution toward God-hood, and we make a mistake to regard it as anything like a finished product. A casual observer must arrive at the conclusion that man in his present state is in advance of the early man of the forest and dug-out. He is at the same time not perfect. He still gives well-marked manifestations of the lower animal kingdom.

The five senses we now possess are the result of ages of evolution, and there will be other faculties and powers developed as the race grows in consciousness.

Clairvoyance is only in its incipiency, and I regard it as a perfectly natural development, a method of budding consciousness latent in all human beings. In due time, when we have earned it, we will all possess this faculty as all possess eyesight. How well Herbert Spencer, in his materialistic way, recognized the eternal law of evolution, when he said, "Man is destined to evolve as far beyond what he now is as he is now beyond the vegetable."

Nature will bring out all these latent powers in time, but there is a shorter road to soul-power, a way by which we can travel much faster. We may drift aimlessly on the tide of evolution, or we may take ourselves intelligently in hand and move rapidly along toward spiritual illumination and power. But let it be plainly said that no man will win by reaching this higher state of soul-power unless he earns it or deserves it. He will succeed in proportion as his motive is unselfish. Selfishness is the stumbling block that seems to be always in our way holding us back and making us unworthy to receive that great compensation that only the soul can give. We must first put a check on purely physical desires, passions, and impulses if we would rise to spiritual power, and nobody will come into possession of anything worth having until he does this. Who would trust a child in a chemical laboratory? Neither will nature put power into the hands of those who could or would use it disastrously. There are hundreds of people to-day who have sensed just a little of this fertile oasis and are now using it in a selfish way to further their own interests, which means in time their downfall.

The way to develop soul-power is to resolve never to be satisfied to remain in one place, but to grow and grow in harmony with the Divine Will of which evolution is but the visible expression. Evolution means unfoldment, unfoldment means soul-power, and soul-power means a perfect life. Growth is obtained only by activity. In physical culture we know in order to increase the size and strength of muscles we must resort to physical exercise. In order to make the brain keen we must exercise it by original thinking; and in order to gain soul-powers we must give free play to the loftiest aspirations of which we are capable.

Now the reverse of this is equally true. To be completely absorbed in material things and the affairs of the objective world and give no thought to higher things, is to stifle the soul in its growth and invite a spiritual atrophy. It is said, to neglect or refuse to use an organ or faculty results in being deprived of it. The parasite is living proof of the above fact. The Dodder, a parasitical creeping plant, sometimes called hell-weed, begins life with roots like other plants, but by and by when it fixes its sucker discs on some neighbor plants and begins to be a parasite, its own roots atrophy for want of use.

The hermit-crab is another living illustration of the fact that nature tolerates no shirking of responsibility. In regard to the hermit-crab, Henry Drummond says: "It once had a hard shell and as good locomotion as other crabs. But when it took up its residence in cast-off shells of molluscs it lost two pairs of legs and its shell became a membrane."

We must use a faculty or lose it. If we would increase our spiritual powers we must put forth spiritual aspirations. Our lives must be purposeful, useful, and unselfish.

The universe in which we live is a training school with many hard lessons for evolving life. We complain sometimes of these hard, difficult problems that come before us, but they are essential to our spiritual education. This life, we might say, is a gymnastic exercise for developing moral fibre and spiritual culture. The experiences in this vast school of life develop courage to withstand adversities. We learn to try our optimism against disappointments and thus learn cheerfulness. We pit our patience against failures and thus gain persistence. We are often torn from the pinnacle of ambition by opponents and thus learn toleration for others. And above all we come in contact with pain and sorrow and thus learn the great lesson of sympathy with suffering.

These are a few of the experiences that make it possible to evolve. How many of us realize that nature will sternly punish any shirking of responsibility? How many of us realize that some things we cannot delegate to others? We can't get into heaven by proxy. As the Apostle Paul has well said, "We must work out our own salvation."

We should face life earnestly, not pretending to more virtue or wisdom than we possess. When we lift up our eyes to behold the possibilities of man we ought to be ashamed of our best achievements.

And so, even in our budding season, when darkness is around us and the divine life is struggling with oppressive conditions, we may feel stirring in us the forces which are shaping the future flower.

"The Widow's Mite and Other Psychic Phenomena." By Rev. I. K. Funk. Price $2.00.

Items of Great Interest.

Furnished by Dr. Sweringen, of Fort Wayne, Ind., Illustrating Impressively the Prevalence of a Belief in Spirit Return.—A Catholic on Spiritualism.—Dr. Savage vs. Dr. Gregory.—A Methodist Divine Sees Spirits.—Spirits Return Spreading.

But little comparatively has been contributed to the literature of Spiritualism by Roman Catholics. Mr. J. Godfrey Roupert, himself a Catholic, has written a work entitled "Modern Spiritism," which bears the imprimatur of the Archbishop of St. Louis, in which he asserts the actuality of the phenomena and combats all theories that refer them to the "subliminal consciousness," or "sub-consciousness," and stoutly contends for all the physical phenomena described by Sir Wm. Crookes, including materialization. His conclusions are that the manifestations must be traced to intelligences of some kind or other, independent of the medium, his audience, or of the sitters. Strange to say, after deducing powerful arguments which identify these intelligences as our "departed friends," he denies this theory, leaving the reader to infer they are evil and seducing spirits personating our loved ones.

Among the arguments he notes which seem to identify these intelligences as our friends in spirit are the following:

1. This theory is being increasingly adopted by scientific men. 2. It is the simplest theory. 3. At first sight it would seem to explain all the phenomena and cover the whole ground. He adds

"The writer knows of instances in which the doubts of years have melted away before a peculiar and familiar touch, or at the reproduction of some well-remembered habit, and in which a single word peculiarly pronounced brought final conviction to the mind. There is, it is fully admitted, a great deal in even very ordinary Spiritualistic phenomena that at first sight speaks strongly in favor of the dead."

Dr. Savage vs. Dr. Gregory.

The New York American recently gave a verbatim report of an interview by the Rev. Thomas B. Gregory with Dr. Minot Savage. It took the form of questions and answers, and we reproduce the same in part, for readers of The Progressive Thinker:

DR. GREGORY: "Upon this subject, Doctor, I will, if you please, ask you a few questions. Does the proof of even one instance of the intercommunication of spirits demonstrate the fact of the deathlessness of the human soul? Is one such instance just as good as would be one million or one hundred millions?"

DR. SAVAGE: "I should say so, because science assumes always the uniformity of the universe. You get one case, you get the law. I think everybody would admit it if one case was thoroughly established."

DR. GREGORY: "Do you understand, Doctor, that, in your opinion—apart from spirit manifestation—there is no proof of another life?"

DR. SAVAGE: "No, I would not quite say that. I would say that there are very strong evidences in other directions, but that it seems to me they all fall a little short of positive demonstration; and while it is possible to build up probabilities, people find some scientific man who will argue along scientific lines that he can prove deathlessness of the soul, but some other scientific man questions that."

DR. GREGORY: "Do you think, Doctor, that there was a case so thoroughly demonstrated as to have left no room for doubt?"

DR. SAVAGE: "In the case of the person having the experience, Yes. But somebody else might raise the question as to whether he had not made some mistake in observation, or ill reporting the facts. You see what I mean; I have an experience that is perfectly satisfactory to me, and you say: I want to see that myself."

DR. GREGORY: "Admitting the possibility of spirit communication, or appearance in these various forms, why is it that the instances of the same are, comparatively speaking, so infrequent?"

DR. SAVAGE: "Well, I should like to write a book on that subject. There are three questions that people ask: What? How? and Why? What includes the observation of facts. How is the investigation of laws as to methods. There are not three Whys that have been answered since the world began. Why did General Grant, when he died, only know two tunes? Why has there been only one supreme dramatic genius in the world? Why? My impression is that psychic geniuses are about as common as any other kind of genius. Now and then you get a genius, but nobody knows why a genius appears when he does. We simply accept the facts. Why one person can conceive these spirit impressions and nobody else can, nobody knows."

"Now, in regard to the infrequency of this, I will venture to say that you will hardly find a block, I mean a block surrounded by four streets, in the city of New York, where in the course of a year these things are not going on, but most people never tell anybody else until they find out that they are going to be listened to sympathetically. I think these things are very frequent, only most people keep still about them. Why I can't have these personal experiences myself, I don't know. If I want something done I hunt for somebody who can do it in this direction as well as any other. If I wanted to telegraph to Chicago I must try and have a wire up and get somebody who understands telegraphy to transmit my message. People have asked me over and over again, Why can't spiritual communications come to me? And I have said: Why won't electricity run up a rope or along a board fence? I don't know why.

DR. GREGORY: "Is there any way, so far as you know, in which the man who has been in communication with departed spirits, can prove the fact to those who have not been in such communication?"

DR. SAVAGE: "I don't see how he can except to those people who have confidence in his ability and honesty as an investigator, unless he can get them to pursue a similar line of investigation. I believe it is possible in time to accumulate such a volume of evidence in this direction on the part of competent parties as to force an acceptance of belief. How many people have investigated that the world is round and can prove it? We take most of our scientific beliefs on evidence of people whose judgment we trust. That is the attitude of most beliefs, is it not?"

DR. GREGORY: "What do you think, Doctor, of the claim made by some that they can, at will, and very easily, produce all the alleged secrets of Spiritualism?"

DR. SAVAGE: "I say this: I stand ready to give any man, Kellar or any magician, I don't care who he is, a check for $1,000 when he will reproduce any one of the half dozen experiences which I have been through, under the same conditions. A magician has his hall and assistants and electrical appliance, and all sorts of aids, and can produce illusions which one who is not initiated would be astonished at, and could not understand or explain. That is simple enough, but if any one of these men will produce similar results under similar conditions, that is quite another matter.

In Baltimore there is a local preacher in the Methodist body named Oldershaw, a good man and true, who has strange experiences and speaks right out in meeting about them. Not long since, in giving his experiences in a Methodist service, he said: "Why, our dead friends are all about us. I see them and they talk to me. Why, you remember Brother Harry Splicer?—he's standing right over there now and enjoying this service with us."

One day, just before leaving for church, he says a certain Brother A—— came to him, entered his room, shook hands with him, and they conversed a few moments. Brother A—— left. On reaching the service, immediately after, he heard announcement that Brother A—— had died some time before. "Oh, he just called on me," said Mr. Oldershaw. If Mr. Oldershaw were in the regular ministry the Heresy Hunter would be after him sure.

Spirit Return Spreading.

A recent number of The New Catholic News contains the following editorial:

"One has but to look at the columns of religious announcements in the press of any great American city to find evidences that Spiritualism has become a widely extended religious cult. Besides those who adhere to it as a systematic form of belief there is an immense number of others who constantly take part in Spiritualistic seances and manifestations. Our priests find themselves with disconcertingly increasing frequency obliged to reply to questions concerning the subject that have not sprung exclusively from mere curiosity."—From Dr. Sweringen, Fort Wayne, Indiana.

Nuggets.

Suggestive Thoughts on Various Subjects, by the Veteran Lecturer, N. F. Ravlin.

Any man or woman of an upright moral character, possessed of psychic gifts, who gives clear-cut messages from friends in the spiritual world to the sorrowing ones of earth, occupies a very high position, and will receive much reward in the hereafter.

But a terrible fate awaits dishonest tricksters, who prostitute their mediumistic powers to nefarious ends.

We boast of a land of liberty, and yet a few thousand men hold eighty millions of people in servile bondage. The system that permits such a state of things is devilish. A civilization that does not civilize, a Christianity that does not Christianize, and a Spiritualism that DOES NOT SPIRITUALIZE, are deformed triplets, born of one mother, Hypocrisy.

If every one KNEW absolutely all he THINKS he knows, what a world of intelligence this would be. It is impossible to know what is not, and difficult to comprehend always what is. Men of least intelligence often assume to be most learned, and wax eloquent in the use of words without sense.

Wise men are like fixed stars or suns; they make no windy bluster, but just SHINE, while all around them rejoice in their light.

Would you be wise, the first lesson to be learned is, that you are a fool. It is generally the last lesson learned, and that very imperfectly.

It would seem God himself does not always know how to manage the affairs of this world, for we have known ministers who are very free to offer him advice and tell him just how it ought to be done.

It is very fortunate that God has those within call who are ever ready to come to his aid, in time of need, otherwise the planet might be wrecked and a general smashup take place.

Those who know most about God are most ignorant of themselves. Too much divinity kills humanity in the end.

It will be an auspicious day, a veritable jubilee, when the Declaration of Independence becomes an actuality in this country. Then and not till then, will the rights of man be respected.

There is too much dead formalism in the religion of orthodoxy, and not enough of the REAL warm-hearted spirit of humanity. Would it not be well to give God a little rest and, meantime, devote more time and effort in relieving the necessities of the poor and suffering human beings all around you. A loaf of bread is of more value to the hungry than a thousand prayers to an unknown God.

The one is pious flattery; the other is JESUS CHRIST IN HUMAN ACTION.

The treasures of celestial wisdom and knowledge do not lie around on the surface, neither are they cognized by mental acumen, but by spiritual discernment.

Through soul introspection we enter the esoteric realm of the hidden wisdom and come in touch with the harmonic vibrations of the Infinite where love becomes the potent action of spiritual understanding.

Flesh and blood cannot discern spiritual verities.

Comparatively few men do the thinking for the great mass of mankind. Such as do not think but copy the thoughts of others are followers, but never leaders of men. Copyists they are, but never originators. Theories are taken for proofs, assumptions for facts. It save the trouble of investigation to take Prof. Somebody's say so in its place. Lazy people belong to this class. This is especially true of theological students. They are taught certain cut and dried systems of Biblical interpretation and they accept it without question. In after years some of the more progresive see the mistake they have made, and begin to think for themselves. They overstep the prescribed limits of the system, and a trial for heresy follows. They are expelled in disgrace from the ministry, for being men with the courage of their convictions.

Young man, THINK FOR YOURSELF.

Exercise common sense, the most uncommon thing in the world. For the egregious errors of orthodox theology, Christianity is not at fault, but a perversion of Christianity is.

Would it not be a good thing and fill a long-felt need to have a Church of Humanity in this world, where human sympathy and love could have scope.

Calvinism. What is it and what does it teach? It teaches a system of dogmatic theology embodied in what is known as "Calvin's Institutes." They are standard authority in all the Presbyterian theological seminaries. The doctrine of election; predestination, and foreordination are cardinal doctrines taught. God, from before the foundation of the world, before any human being walked the earth, elected a certain number to be saved, without any regard to character or fitness, and all others not included among the elect, to be eternally tormented in a lake of fire and brimstone.

Do what they would, the elect could not be lost. Do what they might the non-elect could not be saved. All non-elect, unbaptized infants were included in the incineration of the damned. What a monster of insatiate cruelty such a doctrine makes of God!

No savage on the warpath ever lived who was not a white angel in comparison with such a character.

Need we be surprised that intelligent men have largely abandoned the church? Men of thought and reason revolt at such an insane caricature of justice. Not one preacher in a hundred believes it nor does he dare preach it. Yet, at his ordination he is required to say he believes it, and thus is made to lie on the very threshold of his ministry. But of course he belongs to the elect, and telling a falsehood can't send him to hell.

A Presbyterian divine(?) recently said to the writer that a man could go to hell on the Golden Rule. "Then," said I, "there is just where I am going. If I must believe Calvinism or be damned, then I'll be damned, and that settles it."

I introduce this nugget on Calvinistic theology for two reasons, namely, Very few church members know what doctrines their creed inculcates. Then on the other hand church members are ever ready to slur Spiritualism, and cast innuendos upon Spiritualists, and especially upon mediums. But Spiritualism never burned any one at the stake. It has never persecuted any for their religion, it has never shed any blood; it has brought light to those in darkness, hope to those in sorrow, tidings and sweet messages from loved ones in the spirit world. It strikes off the shackles of ignorance and superstition. It clothes man with dignity and honor, instead of making him a beggar or worm of the dust, impotent, helpless, deserving nothing but damnation.

The Spiritual philosophy teaches the dignity and moral grandeur of man, "A part of one stupendous whole, Whose body nature is, and God the soul."

Spiritualism is naturalism, pure and simple. Its manifestations are according to the operation of natural laws. Hence miracles, so-called, are natural phenomena not understood. Ignorance or childish wonder calls them miracles.

Now we wish to say, that Spiritualists are the happiest and most intelligent people on this planet. They think for themselves. They are also the freest people in the world. They are under bondage to no system of dogmatic tyranny. They are loyal citizens of the country to which they belong. They believe in right living, and the Golden Rule is their motto.

Now, I would say to the enemies of Spiritualism: When you know what they know, when you have seen what they have seen, felt what they have felt, you will be a great deal wiser than you are to-day, and you will not be so ready to condemn that of which you know nothing—ABSOLUTELY nothing.

THOUGHTS FROM THE ROCKIES.

Dealing With Sundry Questions of Great Importance.

The questions of Emmet Densmore, and answers to the same by four foremost pioneers in Spiritualism, in The Progressive Thinker of Feb. 29, will awaken a review of earlier Spiritualism, compared with its present status. But in order to do this, a substratum must be taken more particularly into consideration than mere surface aspects; although it, as a whole, is well worth considering in the same connection.

First, all truths, concealed or suppressed, as spirit communion had been until its late awakening, sixty years ago, must, according to the universal law of evolvement, some day come to light, and its probabilly and possibility tested by a critical public. Every known science, from astrology to wireless telegraphy, has been contested, and its advocates ridiculed; its believers at times were ostracised, burned or imprisoned, simply for their adherence to what they considered facts, by bigoted and intolerant creedists. All explorers and all reformers have had the same experience when buffeting against a solid phalanx of ignorant hordes, led by brutal and jealous bigots.

In spite of all such opposition, the universal trend of evolution still pressed forward. The Universalists, in breaking away from orthodoxy, together with lessons from Athanasian creeds, in earlier days believed that all would eventually be saved from eternal punishment; and the Second Adventists deemed it a sin to go to law against another fellow mortal. Here were two great strides towards the fraternalism of one, and a bright prospect of the other. But see how both have been ridiculed by the more orthodox.

The two great fraternities, the Masons and Oddfellows, have never admitted a savior in their creeds, while both are endeavoring to establish a higher moral standard and make men more manly, honorable and true. They, also, have been set upon by "bulls" from Pope and ridicule from bigots. Still, all forward movements are urging along unabated, although at times past the ostracism has been nearly intolerable.

The wave of progress was irresistible, and sensitive minds were imbued with new thoughts, who would proclaim their belief or knowledge, regardless of what the craven bigot would say. Thus, in earlier days, a Spiritualist was classed as a heretic or overzealous religious enthusiast in certain sections of the United States, and with still harder names on the European continent; and when the writer received positive proof of spirit communion forty-four years ago, some of the newsdealers would not handle the Banner of Light or other similar publications, while every orthodox Christian knew that Spiritualism was from the devil, and that Thomas Paine was in hell for his infidelity. The devil was considered to be at the bottom of all progressive movements, and even the preachers deplored the abolition of negro slavery.

As years rolled by, an enthusiasm sprang up among many classes about the mystery of Spiritualism, and while some were anxious to know if it were a truth, more went to ridicule and falsify its manifestations; and even the secular press with its atheistic reporters misrepresented facts in their endeavor to make it unpopular, as it conflicted with the trend of the thoughts of the Christian as well as the belief of the atheist. But "fiat lux" was inscribed on the crested wave as it bore the grandest tiding the world had ever known from the world of soul to mankind.

At the same time many other changes took place. The jealous god was discarded from the Methodist prayers, and in its stead was inscribed, "God is Love," while the Christian Scientists later adopted the same.

The hard-shell Baptist would hold union service with the formerly despised Universalist, and the Presbyterian would loosen the slave-link in his creed against woman, while the old Paganistic Roman creed held a deaf ear to these great progressive movements, and holds it to this day.

Spiritualism came into the world in earnest, with the intention to stay, as it presented facts; but was a mercenary populace ready for it? Are men ready in this restless age to drop policy, jealousy, greed, misrepresentation and acquisitiveness beyond where it is demanded by the two great laws of nature—self-preservation and protection of the species? If not, never expect faultless communications from the spirit realm from the great, the grand and the good, who have passed to higher life; while the ones who have lately passed the border land may, with assistance, communicate, giving the same views as they entertained here, and no higher. Such communications of the latter may prove immortality of the soul, which every inquisitive mortal may desire, but nothing beyond that.

To see the necessity of living true lives in the full meaning of the words, is one thing to be taught, and to adopt to live such a life is the requirements; hence how many of us are ready to comply strictly with these teachings? Spiritualism has come to establish this in order to expect pure and truthful messages from the land of souls; but in a restless age with its grasping commercialism it has found much opposition from within as well as from outside sources.

The enthusiasm of mortals on this plane of existence has somewhat subsided with regard to Spiritualism, which undoubtedly makes it more scientific, in this that it is not so apt to merge into absurdities and theorizing on unheard of possibilities; but investigators in the orthodox churches, concerning these facts represented through mediums, are becoming more numerous, that only the "saving grace" holds the church members within its folds. When that fails, the churches may adopt spirit communion within their creeds, which was predicted forty years ago.

To true Spiritualists such a move would be heralded with joy, as a more full understanding of what constitutes true living will be studied by the masses, and a more fraternal feeling established. Spiritualists should not endeavor to proselyte or draw members from any creed, only through kindness, justice and truthfulness prove that their example is worthy of emulation. If we have a new thought, give it WHEN ASKED FOR, but force no arguments. Be well informed concerning facts, historical and otherwise, religious or secular, that we may instruct and not mislead by supposable theories. Corroborative evidence, as has been established by courts, in the majority of cases becomes co-equal to facts, hence by summing up all spirit messages (where one has no developed mediumship) we can map out a spirit world with its inhabitants, schools, sceneries, etc., while only receiving messages from one individual spirit, though ever so truthful, only a feeble insight can be acquired, and some of it may err in transmission.

Thirty-five years ago this great West was peopled with pioneers, who were honest and kind, but that was all that could be said of them. Today, after a continuous migration from the East, there is some kindness displayed, but less honesty. The more churches the more jealousy, which, after endeavoring to get their god in the constitution, they tried to close the entire West on Sunday for religious services. They failed in both. Then they got a Sunday-rest law enacted, which is in force to-day. Such are the last dying throes of creeds built on legends, and with the intent to hold man in subjection according to their puritanic dictum. All these things, undoubtedly, are part of evolution, and necessary, but where will the creeds be when sober facts, in opposition stare them in the face, acknowledged by courts and governed by liberal laws?

Finally, with reference to a decadence in Spiritualism: It can never be! Retrogression is an impossibility! The wave of progress may rest for recuperation, but facts can never be annihilated. Of course, experience has shown that communications from spirits on lower strata have increased of late years, but this must all be for some wise purpose in the evolution of things. It would not take many decades to reform this earth's enlightened populace, were it not for the myriads of mortals who have passed to the soul world for ages, who have to be reformed also, as the phalanx of brotherhood is not confined to this earth, but reaches into the great Eternal, and mortals on either side of the River Styx are in thoughts and soul-growth depending, influenced and inspired by each other.

DREAM HELPS POLICE CHIEF.

Sees Prisoners Escaping—Hurrying to the Jail He found Them Sawing the Bars of the Cell.

Bristol, Tenn.—A dream that came true has prevented the escape of five State prisoners confined in the City Jail.

Chief of Police Samuel D. Keller of Bristol, Va., had the dream. Most realistically, he says, did he see prisoners cutting their way to liberty with a steel saw. He was so much impressed with the vision that he arose, dressed and hastened to the jail.

As he entered the prison he heard the noise of a saw. On investigation he found the men were cutting the hinges of the door leading from the main corridor. He had arrived just in time to prevent the escape of five prisoners.

Keller confined the men in a steel cage until daylight, keeping watch over them himself, and then sent them to work with the chain gang on the county roads.—St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

Germs of Mind in Plants
By R. H. France, Translated by A. M. Simons.—Cloth, Illustrated, 50 Cents.
A cardinal point in the philosophical systems favored by the ruling classes is that the mind of man is something unique in the universe, governed by laws of its own that have no particular connection with physical laws. Modern science has proved that not only animals, but also plants receive impressions from the outside world and use data thus obtained to modify their movements for their own advantage, exactly as human beings do. These facts are told in this book in so charming and entertaining a style that the reader is carried along and does not realize until later the revolutionary significance of the facts.

The Foundation of Religions.

Spiritualistic Phenomena Personified the Real God of the Jews as Well as the Holy Spirit of the Christians.—The Foundations of all Religions Based Upon the Same Thing, Viz., Psychic or Spiritualistic Phenomena.

Man is a religious creature. All nations at all ages of which we have a record worshiped in some manner.

Take away from man his hope of a future life in some shape and he loses ambition. Hope stimulates him, enthuses him, electrifies him. Time and time again have I personally come in contact with men and women who told me that if it were not for the faint glimmer of hope that there is a future existence, through their knowledge of Spiritualism, they would immediately end their life. Religion, which binds together such hopes of men, then, must become a great psychological factor in nations, for laws are only classified social customs which in return are based upon religious convictions. Religion in some form then is the foundation of society and seems to be necessary to man's happiness.

Modern science is making plain many of the old obscure phenomena. Thus modern bacteriologists can read of an epidemic disease in ages long ago, and from the meagre description given by the writer of that time can tell from what particular germ of infection that epidemic was caused. From geological strata it is possible to tell just what animals were in existence at certain ages of the earth's history.

Usually when a matter becomes plain it is found that it is simple, and frequently surprise is offered that the simple cause was not discovered before.

There is no doubt a basis for all religions, and I think it is about time that the simple facts be made known, and the truth told about inspiration in such plain language that he who runs may read.

Just as sure as our modern knowledge of germs gives us a clue of the cause of epidemic diseases in ages past, and equally as sure as our present knowledge of geology gives us a history of animals existing on the earth's surface at certain ages long ago, just so sure our modern knowledge of absolute facts in psychic phenomena proves to us of one cause in all the past ages as the basis for all religious manifestations.

Different people at various ages had a different conception of a supreme force or intelligence, and this would be but natural when race, climate, social conditions and environment are taken into consideration.

Psychic manifestations have always been more unreliable, however, and all information about a future life has been received through inspiration of some sort. Inspiration now is and always was unreliable, and the inspired utterances were directly in proportion to the knowledge, education, honesty as well as environment of the one inspired, and as the sum total of education is rapidly increasing so we can constantly detect a higher degree of inspired utterances.

The mass of inspired utterances and writings to-day, however, is a conglomeration that would make the sincere, honest investigator discouraged. No doubt the same has always been the case, and in the age of superstition, and when there was no science, this no doubt forced the real basis of dogma.

With the decline of dogma and loss of old religious beliefs among intelligent people we should more than ever encourage the investigation and study by intelligent men of these various phenomena. Investigators should not only be encouraged, but they should also be subsidized so that their whole mind may be occupied on this line of work.

A nation becomes truly great and perfect in exact proportion as each individual attains toward perfection, and as religious motives are the basis of society and these in return are based upon psychic phenomena, and as the old is passing away, great effort should be made to apply modern scientific methods to these basic facts of the foundation of religions, so that the masses may know the new as they now do the laws of chemistry, electricity and modern medicine.

The sooner that the Jews will see that this is the very base of their religion, and claim them as the vital part of their belief, and then demand modern scientific methods applied to them, and encourage the study of them morally and financially as they now do medicine, chemistry and electricity, so soon will they cease splitting up through "modernism" and will again perhaps become a solid institution; for they will then learn that this is the very base of their belief and that these phenomena were the real underlying principle of their former greatness. They can then readily see that their prophets were the true, honest Spiritualists of their day, with the difference only that they were working for the nation and for the national good, and not for "great gain" for themselves and their masters.

By a little investigation any intelligent man or woman can readily see that the Spiritualistic phenomena are here and now, just as they ever were, and that they are the basis of all former religious beliefs.

The phenomena of clairvoyancy, clairaudency, telepathy, the physical manifestations of Bailey, Eusapia Paladino and Madam d'Esperance, as well as the trance mediumship of Mrs. Piper, Stainton Moses and many eminent sensitives to-day prove conclusively that these phenomena are the basis of all the previous religious beliefs. True, some of these phenomena may yet be proven to be fraud, and much may be from sources other than that which is claimed for the same. If this be so, however, it will simplify matters, for if it is possible in this age of intelligence and science to fool people, how much more must it have been so in the narrow-minded, superstitious ages of long ago.

Surely there are none so blind as those who do not wish to see. The Jew and Christian can see plainly if they choose to do so, that the real basis of their faith is here to-day as much as ever. True we do do not live in an age when everything is personified, for, with the exception of the personification of a few countries like "Uncle Sam" for America and "Johnny Bull" for England, we prefer to call things by their real names.

There is much boasting about Modern Spiritualism, but in reality there is no such thing, for Spiritualism and Spiritualistic manifestations are as old as mankind itself. If it were not for the founders of this great land, who wisely incorporated religious freedom in our constitution, and if it were not for the great intelligent press, and above all the work of the scientist; if these psychological factors were not in existence Spiritualism would not have made the progress in America that it has in the past fifty years, for Spiritualists themselves have done very little to advance this cause in a modern way, or to discover any of the laws, or even why that the present phenomena as well as the past has been so unreliable. On the contrary many who show outwardly that they are sincere believers in the phenomena, and have used the most sacred instincts of man as a cloak, have been caught in high-handed fraud and in this way brought distrust and opprobrium on the these beautiful truths. True the atmosphere is clearing, for men with influence among believers in this philosophy are now wielding a great purifying force. However, as scientific men work out problems and make known its laws, and as the better class of Spiritualists themselves aid in this uplifting process, the tendency of the psychological environments is all for the better, but with this will come an increased number of believers and they will surely demand laws for the punishment of those who are caught open-handedly trafficking in the highest and holiest sentiment of mankind. This is already manifest in the ordinance that has been established in this city by the better class of Spiritualists themselves, and which has done good service even in the short while that it has been in force. Surely sincere Spiritualists will encourage and welcome just laws to protect the honest seeker after truth along these lines.

The old Jewish prophets were working for the aggrandizement and good of the Jewish nation, and were dedicated priests to that purpose, and as they acted somewhat in the capacity of our Congressmen, their inspiration was naturally on a plane with their ambition, honesty, prejudice and education. If the old prophet did not feel well, if perhaps he was hungry or had eaten something that did not agree with him, or if, perchance, he was prejudiced or displeased, then the inspiration through him was flavored in proportion to that individual prophet's state of health or condition of mind. If he was mean, then the influences through him were mean; if he was angry and displeased, then these influences expressed themselves in the same way. THE SAME IS IDENTICALLY TRUE WITH THIS PHENOMENA TO-DAY.

The learned men of the old Jews really believe about the same as modern Spiritualists do, but with the difference that as they lived in an age when forces were personified, therefore very naturally they personified this force and thought they walked and talked with God instead of individual spirits, and this would be but natural because as environments have much to do with us to-day as also surely it had at that time. At the time the Greeks personified every force of nature, and the same is true of the Romans, Druids, as well as Egyptians, and it is but plain to see that the Jews have developed this one great power (monotheism) and that they in exact accordance with their psychological environment at their date, personified this great force and called it Jhvh, El Loah, El Gebor, El Hail, El Shaddah. The translators, too were to a great extent influenced with this personifying environment and interpreted it to suit their narrow views, as father, God, Lord, etc.

The Jews at no time saw any more of their God than we do to-day, and their only way of consulting him was along the same lines that we consult these phenomena today. See I. Sam. XXVIII. 3-6.

We place very little reliance upon dreams, however, and consult sensitives instead of prophets, and use the planchette, automatic writing and table tipping, instead of the Urim and Thummim.

What is true of the Jews is equally true of the early Christians. By a little comparison it can readily be seen that they had absolutely nothing but Spiritualistic phenomena at any time, and in exact accordance with the psychological environments they personified it and called it holy spirit.

By comparing with what we have to-day, we can readily see that this is the real basis of the Buddhistic, Mohammedan, American Indian, Mormon, Swedenborgian as well as all other forms of religious belief.

By careful investigation based upon modern knowledge we are absolutely certain now that the foundations of all religions are identically one and the same, and I am convinced, therefore, that all future splitting up of religious dogmas must continue until the bottom is reached; which is this now much-despised Spiritualistic phenomena. Thus the stone which the builders rejected (perhaps because of its unreliability and that they did not live in an age of science) becomes the head of the foundation or the cornerstone.

Modern scientific methods make it possible to assert that the foundation of all religions is one and the same, viz.: Psychic, metapsychic or Spiritualistic phenomena; however that they now are, and no doubt always were, unreliable (perhaps because we do not yet understand the laws) and that they now are and constantly have been preyed upon by the charlatan and pretender for gain and notoriety.

I am confident, however, that if the phenomena are carefully studied by intelligent men over a series of years and their laws discovered (just as chemistry, electricity and modern medicine are now being studied) then I am sure it will become just as reliable as these other sciences and that religion and thereby society will advance just as far beyond our crude, ancient ideas as the modern science of chemistry, electricity and modern medicine is superior to the ancient idea.

That the Jews had absolutely nothing but Spiritualistic phenomena as a basis for their religious belief can readily be determined and I venture the opinion that modernism will continue to divide that bigoted sect until plain common sense will show them that modern methods applied to the basic principles of their faith will not only rejuvenate their faith, but will also show them that they were the first to personify this one great force and call it God.

What is true of the Jews is even more true of the Christians; they will, no doubt, go on splitting up into sects until they apply modern scientific methods to the fundamental principles of the religious beliefs, which they will then discover are the now much despised phenomena. See I Cor. XII.

When I hear a Jew or Christian denounce Spiritualistic phenomena, I am reminded of a man sitting on a limb and trying to saw it off between himself and the trunk of the tree. For the foundation of their faith rests entirely on this class of phenomena.

Education and the application of modern scientific methods should be encouraged by everyone who believes in this beautiful cause, for the facts exist and to carefully study and know the laws that control it should be the chief aim of all those who are interested in it.

Myers says: "Science must be sublimed into philosophy, and then kindled by religion into a burning flame." And how true this is becoming.

In an article in the Broadway Magazine for May, 1908, by Mr. Thomas Dixon, Jr., entitled "Is Christianity on the Decline?" he shows statistics that it is, and, especially in that great metropolitan center, New York, and that just in proportion as the old dogmatic man-made religion is on the decline in just that same proportion humanity is getting better in that great city, and he winds up with the statement: "While the old organic religion has been dying, a vast church has been slowly growing outside of the church. Here the real heart of humanity beats. Here millions drift awaiting the call of the prophet whose genius shall create new forms in which to direct divine energies." This then plainly shows that the people appreciate and encourage practical things which are now shaping the way for the next practical religion that is surely coming.

Surely a truth that can change the heart of hard-hearted, materialistic Lombroso, and make a Lodge say, "Within the past few years every scientist in Europe has turned preacher," is to be regarded only in the light that things are looked upon and received everywhere as being far superior to the old crude things and ideas of a darkened, superstitious age of long ago.

Progress is the order of the day. "Lift up, look up," are matters that Spiritualists could well appropriate, "and I, if I be lifted up (by scientific methods) will draw all unto me."

Let the lifting up process go on. Encourage it in every way possible.

LAKE PLEASANT, MASS.

New Cottages Going Up.—Trees Set Out.—Activity All Along the Line.

Before Lake Pleasant will be ready for the opening of camp meeting, Sunday, Aug. 2, a great deal of work is yet to be done, and in consequence more activity is demanded upon the part of the management and general membership than in any previous year, and the demand is being met.

The writer was at the Lake during the past week and found four splendid cottages in process of construction, two upon the Highlands being built by John Johnson and Geo. W. Edwards respectively, and two on the old grounds, one on Winona street by Frank Wilbur and one on Broadway by Mrs. Mary A. Wales.

The work of cleaning the grounds has commenced under the supervision of Director Wm. Critchley, who has just returned from Lake Helen, Fla.

Mrs. Albert P. Blinn, with her mother and sister, are occupying the Alexander cottage for the season, which will be the headquarters of the writer after June 1. The Association water plant is being put in order and pumping will commence June 1. The management has engaged the Lake Pleasant quartette to furnish music for the camp meeting services, and on Sunday additional soloists will be employed.

A large number of quick growth trees have been purchased by the Association and set out in the burned district to replace those destroyed by fire.

Calls for circulars are being received by the secretary, and two thousand programs have already been sent out in response, which means a big season at "dear old Lake Pleasant" this summer. Mrs. Abram H. Dailey, accompanied by her nephew, visited the grounds last week, preparatory to opening her new cottage on First avenue for the season. About sixty cottages are now occupied, and new arrivals daily.

Appreciates the Work of the Progressive Thinker.

To the Editor: I am going to ask you for a few inches of space in your wonderful paper, The Progressive Thinker, to express MY APPRECIATION of the great work being accomplished by it, not only on general lines, but in the printing of Mr. Carrington's Report of his experience at Lily Dale, and the masterly review by that peerless leader, Mr. Harrison D. Barrett.

Such sentiments, coming from our ablest men, cannot fail to elevate the tone of our beloved cause in the estimation of the world, especially of the better class of people, the scientists, college men and women, editorial staffs, teachers and thinkers generally. The rabble will be stunned, and for a time resentful, perhaps, but will surely be benefited in the end.

The gallant fight being carried on by The Progressive Thinker IN BEHALF OF HONESTY AND INTEGRITY, is splendid. Innocents were rapidly being swallowed, as I have seen a snake swallow a frog in a zoo, by those rapacious frauds in the guise of mediumship.

If we are to carry this greatest of all phases of scientific research, the physical demonstration of spirit return and communion with us, here and now, we must be honest and fearless in all things, and stand together, shoulder to shoulder with those honest, earnest men who are devoting their lives to this work.

Sincerely,

MRS. M. A. McHATTON.

An Easter Sunday, With Room to Breathe

They've brought "the lilies of the field" within the stifled walls;—
The winged songster, caged, they've brought who melancholy calls
In song for freedom to the air and out-door, sunny skies,
While silk and velvet, wealth and pride with Paganism vies!

"Come unto me," the Master said, while on the Mount He stood;—
About Him bloomed the lilies fair, beyond Him stretched the wood
Wherein the feathered songsters trilled their notes of grateful praise, Unmindful of "the wrath to come" or wants of coming days.

"Your Heavenly Father feedeth these;; and Solomon, of old,
Was not arrayed, in all his pomp, like one sweet lily, bold!"
"Suffer the children" — sweetest phrase!—"to come to me," He said;
"For, of such ones the Father's home above is surely made!"

The Temple grand he spurned, in in pride; too small its confined space
To hold the spirit of His words or vibrate to His grace!
Afield, beneath the open skies, his fellowmen He brought;
And there, without a fee, to them His Father's message taught.

His truth goes swinging down the aisles of ages yet to be;
Nor pomp nor fame can stifle it till every child is free
From churchly greed, from doctrine false of pardon bought with blood,
And all men know a Father kind, 'tis He, alone, is GOD!

About a year ago you published a communication from me pertinent to the subject of "A Spiritualist Church;" and, while I have not, in the meantime, obtruded another article of that nature, it is not to say that I have not been reading and thinking upon it. This is a vital question, not only to Spiritualists, but to the entire religious world—a question still asking for proper solution.

There have appeared in your paper from time to time, various good articles on the subject, pro and con, of organizing and maintaining a Spiritualist church, which I have pondered with profit and relish; but as my sense seems to lead me to the "con" side rather than to the "pro," I particularly enjoyed the article from our veteran brother, H. E. Pomeroy, of Mazon, Ill, in The Progressive Thinker, No. 959. I crave your space and patience while I quote him, briefly:

"You must excuse me when I say I want to be convinced that Spiritualists are a better set of cranks than the orthodox outfit; but I doubt it! The dominant element are determined to call it a religion, establish a priesthood, pander to the superstitious element in human nature, and, ride at half fare!" He might have properly added that they would also take a false pride in attaching handles, such as "Reverend," to their names, just for show and sound, while every sensible person knows those marks of distinction are worthless for practical purposes of disseminating the truth.

One of your many well-pleased readers says of The Progressive Thinker, "Its breath gives us fresh air!" and so say I; but, surely, the exponent should not be greater nor more tolerant than the principle expounded! To drive the nail on the head, I have this point to offer in argument against Spiritualism becoming a church, or "churchy," in any modern sense of the word: All the churches are, in greater or lesser degrees, spiritual, which comes from the fact that they are permeated WITH, and are, therefore, LESS THAN, Spiritualism. The lesser measure cannot contain the greater, but in part; nor can the greater become the lesser, nor like it, but in part. Furthermore, all so-called religions, so far I have been able to read and discover, are built upon theories and hypotheses, more or less vague, none of which are, at best, demonstrable to sane human comprehension; while the worst of them are merest nonsense, or intentional falsehood. On the contrary, Spiritualism stands out alone as the one cult or sect which asks not blind faith but lays down facts—propositions which can be proven to both the outward and inward senses of man. In other words, it is a science, as per the correct definition of that word, viz., "Classified KNOWLEDGE."

We are prone to smile—a pitying smile—when we hear an orthodox divine speak of "the science of Christianity;" as well might one talk of the "science of mythology," since they are akin so nearly. Let us be sensible! Would it not sound ridiculous to hear a student of astronomy preach of "the religion of astronomy," meaning thereby that there was a saving grace which, while it could not be proven, was sufficient to everlastingly save all who believe in it, or to damn all who could not, or would not, accept and believe it! Yet, the astronomer would have this in his favor, that the study of his science would enlighten, if it did not literally save!

If the postulates—the philosophy and phenomena—of Spiritualism be true, as preached and upheld by the best Spiritualists of to-day, then is Spiritualism true just as any fact of astronomy, geology, botany, or any of the sciences, is true. Then, it IS science; and you can not make a religion (in the common acceptation of that word) out of it; while, if you attempt to attach a religion or a religious formula onto it, like a tail to a kite, you may fancy you have balanced it somewhat, but you are going to hold it down in its flight by UNNECESSARY ballast. It scientifically balances its own self, if it be a science, if it be true; and if not, then it is no better than all other so-called religions. Then, what use is discussion?

To be sure, organization is necessary for the proper promulgation and defense of the cause as against 'the world, the flesh and the devil," which three elements are deeply entrenched within the church to-day, and are doing all in their power to prohibit the onward march of Spiritualism to a final victory in the souls and lives of all mankind. But why copy after their methods by the use of altars, robes, titles and ceremonies which do but make the LETTER and kill the SPIRIT, while satisfying the ambitious appetites of some who seek for place, name and notoriety among men rather than that all men should be served and taught and honored, alike, before God?

If you establish and build up a church, you MUST get members and adherents; they MUST come from among the present-day children of earth all of whom are, already, of some established faith. This means that you must proselyte them and get them away from their former church. Can you do it? Would it be wise to do so, IF you could? You cannot get them all, and make the other churches "shut up shop;" and so you will have but a piece of the great prize which is destined, in time, to be yours. Ye are the leaven that leaveneth the whole measure; but if ye will be small, and get off into a corner by yourselves, being greedy of laudation and fame, anxious to be known and recognized of men and governments in various quarters as a power by reason of your numbers and your names, then ye shall fail of the purpose whereto ye were intended. A truth is God's property; and like Him it MUST be UNIVERSAL! Why, then, seek to circumscribe it?

Away, then, with priestly robes and churchly titles! Away with preachercraft, and priestcraft, domineering of the untaught masses by a few favored ones of God's children; but let every man, according to his talent, show God to his brother man in the words and acts of his own life, bringing "Life and Immortality to light," as did The Christ sent to men in the days of old! Then will that glad Sunday break across our world when the Sun of Man will be arisen, indeed, and his effulgent rays shine alike into and upon the souls of all earth's children; and they shall breathe the air of God's pure atmosphere, unafraid of death or hell, or a vengeful God; and all men shall KNOW and LOVE the AllFather, Giver of Life to ALL His children; and there shall be one, and only ONE RELIGION, which will be too big for any church and which MAY be called by the name of "Spiritualism," 'or some other name, it matters not, only so the few do not fatten off its blessings while the many remain bodily and spiritually poor, as they do in all the so-called Christian denominations of to-day. So may it be! Amen!

A STRIKING CONTRAST.

"Gillette in Heaven; Girl in Hades."

Albany, N. Y.—"Chester Gillette, I firmly believe, is in heaven. Grace Brown, according to my belief, is expiating her sins in hell!"

This remarkable statement was made by the Rev. Henry McIlravey, who converted Chester Gillette in Auburn, being his spiritual adviser and working with him until the murderer went to his death in the electric chair and received his confession of guilt.

"I am as confident as I am alive," declared Rev. Mr. McIlravey, "that Chester Gilleette is in heaven. His conversion was complete. He has been a Christian man and I never saw a man go to meet his God with more faith in the future than he.

"Grace Brown sinned; that we know. But I have no knowledge that she repented and that her sins were forgiven. If she died unrepentant, no matter if she died a violent and unexpected death, her soul is undergoing punishment now, according to my belief."

The above appeared in the Denver Daily News of recent date. The next morning, in the same paper, a number of the leading preachers of the city are quoted on the subject. Without exception they condemn the utterance of the Rev. McIlravy. It is very encouraging to Spiritualists and liberal-minded people generally to see so many orthodox preachers repudiate the old church doctrines and accept the philosophy long taught by Spiritualists.

The Rev. David Utter, D.D., of the Unitarian church, said:

"The New Yorker's opinion is entirely consistent with orthodox theology. It's logical according to old Calvinistic notions, but modern liberality seems inconsistent with that faith. Of course, to me, McIlravey's opinion is strange and unreasonable, but I cannot see how a believer in the old confession of faith could arrive at any other conclusion than he did.

"Sometimes, however, their common sense gets away with orthodoxy."

Even Catholics of ability recoil from the old Paganistic teachings of the vicarious blood atonement. Rev. Father Wm. O'Ryan, the most prominent Catholic priest of Denver, said:

"Such a statement is wholly abominable, anti-Christian and seems an abomination in the sight of men and God, Judgment is with God. For a Christian minister to declare that she who had been betrayed, who had been murdered, has lost her life, while he, who was the betrayer and the murderer, has gained heaven, must be an offense to every follower of our Lord."

What marvelous progress the orthodox church has made since the advent of Modern Spiritualism! Sixty years ago the ordinary sermons opened and closed with awful threats that the unbaptized would be tortured forever in a literal hell of fire and brimstone—that many, if saved at all, would be saved through the merits of Christ's shed blood—that a life of good deeds availed nothing—that man's goodness was "filth and rags in the sight of God." Such teachings of the church were about as immoral and vicious as ignorance and slavish superstition could give birth to. At this critical time came Spiritualism with its hopeful, cheering, uplifting message. It reaffirmed the teaching of Jesus: "As ye sow, so shall ye reap." "Every man shall be rewarded according to the deeds done in the body." The departed ones told us to look up and not down; that no soul would be irretrievably lost—that we must, in this world and the next, "work out our own salvation"—that there is punishment in this state of existence and the next for wrong doing, but that such punishment is not vindictive, but corrective and educational.

Let Spiritualists rejoice and be glad that the angel world, through them, has banished old Paganistic orthodoxy, and effectively destroyed its power to enslave humanity by its mind-dwarfing, God-dishonoring, cruel, immoral dogmas.

Tolerance of Mohammedanism.

Christians, here is a sentence from Max Muller's "India: What Can It Teach Us?" page 65:

"There are no less than seventy-two sects of Mohammedans; and every one of these sects would not only take in the followers of every other religion on earth, but every member of every one of the other seventy-one sects; and the nearer that sect is to his own the greater the merit of taking in its members."

Does not this suggest the broadest religious toleration to you, Christians? To all of us? If Mohammedans can tolerate opposing faiths, why may not all do so?

When Spiritualism came to the front, sixty years ago, the honest, conscientious and truthful investigator hailed the revelations with delight, as furnishing positive evidence of a continued life. They supposed the whole religious world would give it a cordial welcome. Instead, churchmen ridiculed the investigators, and credited spirit communications to the devil. Whilst the masses, and even a portion of the clergy have gradually accepted the truths revealed to the world, churchmen generally have continued their system of intolerance, and even of persecution. Characteristic of Christianity, they will steal our faith when it becomes popularized, then persecute its original defenders, as they have done by the Jews, and the Pagans. They even stole hell from the latter, and use it as a scarecrow to frighten belief in a dream begotten God.

The Way They Love Each Other.

Protestants and Catholics are now nob-nobbing with each other. The anaconda slimes its victim all over before swallowing it. And this act is now being perfomed by Catholic prelates on Protestants. Formerly it was the practice to burn heretics, but civilization advanced too rapidly to continue the practice, so now the methods of the serpent are coming to the front.

Father Phelan, a very zealous and earnest Catholic, put himself on record a few years ago by declaring:

"Protestantism! Why we would draw and quarter it and hang it up for crow's meat! We would tear it with pincers and fire it with hot irons! We would fill it with molten lead and sink it in hell fire one hundred fathoms deep."

That is the sort of love the Catholic mother has for her daughter. And yet Protestants are the jackals of Catholics, and are laboring to make effective the direction of Pope Leo XIII., when he said:

"All Catholics [meaning all Christians] should exert their power to cause the Constitutions of States to be modeled after the principles of their Church."

Symbol of Christianity.

We dare not forget to-day that we venerate an empty Cross; it is empty forever of that Burden which once hung there, tortured, dying, dead; and banished, too, is that blankness of despair, that sad dismay and disillusion with which it was yelled until the first Easter moring. The Cross—not the Crucifix—is the symbol of Christianity.—Walter Lowrie.

But the cross, like every other Christian symbol, was stolen from Paganism.

True politeness is perfect ease and freedom. It simply consists in treating others just as you love to be treated yourself.—Chesterfield.

Pagan Belief in Immortality.

It is a generally conceded fact that prior to the Babylonian captivity the doctrine of immortality was unknown to the Jews. The Old Testament seems silent on the subject; and that "wisest of men," Solomon, as reputed to be taught by him in Ecclesiastes, 3:19, declared in so many words:

"That which befalleth the sons of men befalleth the beasts; even one thing befalleth them; as one dieth, so dieth the other. Yea, they have all one breath; so that man hath no pre-eminence above the beast."

Churchmen strive by implication to make it appear a future life was taught by the Jews; but we have labored in vain to find the text prior to the captivity, properly interpreted, that supports such a claim.

Paul, 2 Timothy 1:10, represents that "Jesus Christ hath abolished death, and hath brought immortality to light."

This is frequently cited by churchmen, declaring that was the purpose of his mission. In sermons, in books, everywhere, and on all occasions, they represent the heathen, they who lived and died prior to Jesus, as sunk in darkness, and without hope for the future. Scholars know better; but they have not the ear of churchmen, and the fraud is perpetuated. Let us be honest, whatever the fate of creeds.

Christianity never taught a higher or nobler motive for virtue and a true life than was inculcated in Pagan philosophy, and Elysium was the goal that awaited the pure and the good. The idea was taught in Egypt for thousands of years before the alleged birth of Jesus. It was common among the Brahmans. It was a leading feature in Buddhism. It had been promulgated more than 2,000 years before Jesus by Zoroaster. It was the central thought in Mithraism, and the incentive for its church organization, whose whole system, with a Messiah, baptism, church and eucharist long before the great flight of our Aryan ancestors, some 1,500 years before our era, to the south and west from Central Asia.

We beg leave to copy the very words of some of the old Pagan philosophers, as we find them in the classics, no one questioning their genuineness.

Pythogoras seems to have been the first among the Greeks who taught an immortal life. He died 497 years before our era. He had traveled in India, learned their philosophy, and was opposed to the shedding of blood of all animals. Pythagoras declared: "Though man's body die, his soul will fly upward to dwell, immortal, and insensible as to time, with Zeus." Pherecydes, the Syrian preceptor of Pythagoras, taught the same faith. "The road to heaven," said Paulus Scipio, "is by the cultivation of justice, and by piety towards one's relations, neighbors and country; but the souls of those given up to pleasure,, who violate the laws of gods and men hover round the earth on quitting the body, and will not return to heaven till after the lapse of ages. And Cicero: "If aught should make it appear to be indicated by Jupiter that we should depart from life, let us obey joyfully and thankfully, and let us think we are dismissed from prison and released from our chains * * * to be free from henceforth from all trouble." Again said Cicero: "We shall only really live when we come to that heavenly life hereafter."

The Pagan tombs are covered with inscriptions expressing belief in a continued life. The doctrine was as earnestly believed and taught by them as subsequently by Christians. We thought to copy many passages by sages and philosophers, from Zoroaster to Jesus, but it would be only a multiplication of the same general facts. These rude barbarians had a Plutonian empire under the earth, where the wicked were punished; but it remained for a Christian, and that a saint, known in ecclesiastical literature as St. Fulgentius, who taught:

"Little children, whether they die before after birth, pass, without the holy sacrament of baptism, from this world, to be punished with the everlasting punishment of eternal fire."

No parallel to such damnable teaching is met with in Pagan literature. This, and persecution for entertaining adverse opinions, are peculiarly Christian, and will remain exclusively theirs until a higher civilization shall sweep their creeds, and their savage inculcations, still common to many sects, into deserved oblivion.

Pagan Prayers Still in Use.

Farrar, in his Paganism and Christianity, page 43, says:

"It is a distinct probability that in the fusion that ultimately took place between Paganism and Christianity, many of the prayers we still use passed with little change from the religious services of Pagan to those of Christian Rome."

He could have stated with equal positive truth, that many Pagan hymns were adapted to Christian needs, and are now doing service in Christian choirs.

"Wife," said the Arkansas husband, "you are putting too many molasses in the elder's coffee." "Not a bit of it," was the reply. "If it was all molasses it wouldn't be too good for a preacher." And she filled the cup to add to his sweetness.

Soft is the music that would charm forever.—Wordsworth

The Lord's Prayer.

The writer listened the other day to a learned, eloquent, and unusually interesting discourse, by a liberal clergyman, his subject, "The Lord's Prayer." He was truthful in the statement that the prayer was an old Jewish one, long in use by those people favored by God, who were eleven times in captivity, and he made a very earnest application of its several parts.

Jesus, a third part of the orthodox Godhead, plagiarized that prayer. He had not originality enough of himself to formulate a prayer, so he borrowed one long in use by his Jewish ancestors. In this, history and our preachers agree.

We were sorry he failed to elaborate the words: "Forgive us our debts as we forgive our debtors." What right have Christians, or anybody else in these times, to use those words. Whoever heard of a Christian forgiving a debtor? The only person we ever knew doing an act of the kind was pronounced insane by a Christian court and a Christian jury. Orthodox and heteredox, and common sinners alike decline to forgive debts, but exact the last farthing. Until within some four score years imprisonment for debt was common in all the American states, and woe to the unfortunate wretch who was unable to pay the deacon, or the priest.

If Jesus had possessed the wisdom of present day divines he would have made a prayer for every-day use, which would have delighted angels and men, and induced prompt action by God, provided he could be tickled with much learning and pretty words.

But listen, ye exacting saints: "If ye forgive not men their trespasses, neither will your Father forgive your trespasses." Good, say we for that information. A Methodist saint who charged his friend five per cent a month, and compounded the interest monthly for a year, will be a delinquent in the final round up, and will probably get an extra dose of the unquenchable, if his creed is of any value. Gee whiz, we'll carry him a whole pailful of cold water to quench his thirst, if we can reach him by consent, or even by stealth. It was his exacting creed that made him so tight-fisted.

Then in that borrowed prayer: "Lead us not into temptation." Is it possible God does such things, and can he be prevailed upon to let up, by our asking him for the special favor?

Sad to relate, the commentators find grave questions surrounding this "Lord's Prayer." Some of them have discovered in it several interpolations which they reject. Falsus in uno, falsus in omnibus, said the civil law—"false in one thing, false in all things." This being the case we are at liberty to discard this plagiarized and doctored prayer, and formulate one to suit our own caprice when we are so foolish as to suppose the mighty ruler of a boundless universe will change his action in the minutest degree because we desire him to do so.

Query: If the Supreme Mind would give ear, and grant the prayer of each of the multitude of petitioners asking for special favors, what kind of a universe would remain?

Exorcising Evil Spirits.

Any system of religion that is conducive to crime is a false religion, and should be discouraged, and as far as possible abated.

Aside from the torture chamber, wars and bloodshed employed to propagate the Christian faith, so soon as firmly established new offenses, unheard of before came into being. As the Bible showed human sacrifices were made to God at times to placate his anger, or as reward for imaginary favors, as in the case of Jephthah, so all along the centuries there have been Christians who sacrificed children, or some dear friend to please their imagined blood-coveting God.

Only a little while ago an aged mother was throttled, under pretense God wanted her to minister around the throne.

Mutilations are common, because a hand, an eye, or some other member of the body has offended, and the deluded victim wanted to obey Jesus.

Every one of the outrages against Nature is justified by Bible texts, and the wonder is, that sensible people are urgent the authority for all this wickedness shall be used as a text-book in the common schools, by which a continuance of those offenses will be assured for coming generations.

Below is a recent telegram recounting a crime at which all humanity will revolt; but it is only one of thousands on thousands of a somewhat like nature, repeated somewhere annually, and for which the damnable book, and the system which fosters it is responsible.

The criminals are arrested, tried, and acquitted, the defense, insanity, It is the kind of insanity a false sys- of religion inspires, leading to misdemeanors and every variety of crime. However unpopular the idea, why should governments discourage anarchism, and encourage those guilty of equally offensive wrongs? But to the quotation:

"Easton, Pa., April 29, 1908:—A coroner's jury to-day rendered a verdict charging Robert Bachman with the murder of Irene May Smith, five-year-old daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Henry Smith, of Alliance. Surgeons, who made a postmortem examination, found death was due to strangulation.

"Bachman will be formally charged with murder. The child was offered as a sacrifice by her parents and uncle, members of a fanatic religious sect whose actions have startled the community.

"The Smiths and Bachman, who is an uncle of the child, and who killed her during his frenzy, are in the county jail. Bachman insists the child was possessed of the devil and he killed her by command from heaven. He maintains he did no wrong and that God will protect him.

"Smith is in a pitiable condition both mentally and physically, but Mrs. Smith is rational and realizes the awful gravity of the situation. She declares she joined the sect to keep peace in the family."

WOMAN DOCTOR SAYS SHE HAS SEEN SOULS LEAVE BODY.

Declares She Witnessed, in Plain View, the Spirit As It Floated Away From Corpse That It a Moment Before Had Animated.

Announcement that a Paris physician and scientist had photographed the soul did not occasion the same startled surprise among members of the medical fraternity in Chicago that it did in quarters where little is known of the progress of materia medica science in its relations to psychic and occult matters.

Chicago physicians are at present conducting investigation concerning materialism of the soul.

A prominent South Side physician has on two occasions witnessed the departure of the soul from the body.

Internes at the county hospital are watching day after day for soul phenomena, and in order to put the soul-finding quest on a more systematic and scientific basis county officials are to be petitioned for permission to photograph deathbeds. It is proposed to take a series of negatives as lives of patients at the county hospital come to an end in hope that upon one delicately sensitized plate trace of a departing soul may be recorded.

Woman Doctor is Leader.

Dr. Rose M. Reading, 6444 Lexington avenue, a graduate of Bennett Medical College, and a practicing physician in Chicago for twenty years years, is leader of the movement to systematize the study of the soul's materiality. Dr. Reading says there is no doubt the experiments of Dr. Jean Baraduc in Paris and the reports of the same have foundation in fact. Dr. Reading is at present a lecturer at the Bennett Medical college, and instructor in the diseases of children at the American Medical college.

At her home on Lexington avenue she talked last night of personal experiences and acquaintance with the souls of dead people.

"The first remarkable experience came to me in East Chicago," said the doctor. "I had been called to attend a little child. The baby was seven or eight months old. Little could be done for it, and I knew it would die. I held it on my lap.

Sees Soul Leave Body.

"Suddenly as I gazed at the baby a shape formed over its little body and then rose about a foot from it. It was of about the consistency of tobacco smoke. It stood still for a moment, and then drifted up toward the corner of the room. Fascinated, I watched it, at the moment failing to appreciate what the phenomena meant. Then I looked at the child in my lap. It was dead. I knew at once I had witnessed the departure of the soul from the body.

"The second instance came about two years later. I and my husband were at the death bed of an old man in Chicago. A bright light was burning in the corner of the room. The end drew near and my husband and I watched closely. As death came the soul departed in a vapory haze, rose toward the ceiling, and finally faded from sight. There is no questioning the tangibility or the materiality of the shape that drifted away from the body of the dying man.

Emotion Veils Vision.

"The reason the soul is not seen more frequently is because men and women at death beds are always moved by unusual emotions. The brain never can see clearly through strong emotion.

"I have given the matter much thought year after year. Medical students who leave the institutions with which I am connected to become internes at the county hospital I instruct to carefully watch for the appearance of souls at the deathbed there. That those who are seeking to collect data of that sort for me do not succeed does not argue anything. Most of them are young, and with minds immature, and cannot suppress unusual emotions at the sight of death.

"It is for this reason that I propose that photographs be taken at each death in the county hospital. It is impossible to tell the exact moment of death, so a series of negatives must be exposed. One of them may catch the soul in its flight. The proposal will, of course, meet with opposition and disfavor at the start, but that is in no way to be compared with what is permitted in the way of vivisection, and the contribution to science would be infinitely greater.

"Do you think it will be possible to tell whether a man has gone to heaven or hell by the movement of his soul after death?" Dr. Reading was asked. "Will it mean anything if a man's soul goes up or down after it leaves the body?"

"I do not believe heaven or hell is located anywhere," Dr. Reading replied. It is a condition simply. I do not believe in reincarnation, but I think the souls of dead stay in the air about us. The fact that both these visions have faded away proves to me that they took up their abode in the air about us. I do not in the least believe in Spiritualism, but I am firm in my belief in the materiality and tangibility of the soul. There have been some wonderful experiments that proved a body weighed less the second after death.

"A most spectacular demonstration of the theory occurred in New York. A number of physicians were trying to prove that electricity is life. A rat was allowed to suffocate in a hermetically sealed glass tube. After death it was the intention to apply the electric current and restore, if possible, life. But at the moment of death a hazy, smokelike cloud, the shape of a rat, left the tube, rose in the air, and then disappeared.

We know but little about the materiality of the soul, of course. It permeates the whole body. How it leaves the body we do not know. There was a time when they did not understand the circulation of the blood. Some day we will know all about the circulation of the soul.

"The study of the materialism of the soul has to go forward slowly and conservatively, of course, because people are prone to pooh, pooh discussions of it and laugh at contentions. But you remember there was a day when they laughed at Fulton because he said he could steam up the Hudson river."

The above is from the Chicago Inter Ocean, and the statements made are somewhat startling. Daniel S. Hager, a prominent physician and a member of the Psychical Research Society, has thoroughly investigated the matter and has full confidence that the statements made by the lady are true.

Review of Rev. R. V. Hunter's Attack Upon Spiritualism.

A distinctly valuable service to Spiritualists has been rendered by Prof. W. M. Lockwood by publishing in neat pamphlet form his able and masterly reply to the attack of Rev. R. V. Hunter, upon Spiritualism. Fairly and squarely he meets and demolishes the doughty Reverend's boldly asserted statements. We opine that the Rev. Hunter and others of his kind will hesitate before they attempt again to demolish Spiritualism, after reading Prof. Lockwood's review.

Additional value is given to this brochure by a striking list of names of Professors, Scientists, Actors, Lawyers and statesmen who accept the facts of modern Spiritualism.

For fifteen cents this valuable pamphlet can be procured of Prof. W. M. Lockwood, 723 Prospect ave., Buffalo, N. Y.

THE N. S. A. LIBRARY.

An Interesting Statement by N. S. A. Secretary Kates.

The circulating library of the N. S. A. comprises more than 800 books, all of great interest to the cause of Spiritualism, with the standard authors of our cause all represented.

The library is freely used by many residents and visitors in Washington. There are some books on Spiritualism that should be in this library. I do not care to list this need at present. But any person possessing books on Spiritualism or kindred subjects, and would like to see the same preserved and made of good service to truth and progress, will be assured that if sent to this office the same will be well employed and carefully preserved. Any new works of interest on any subject of imprt to humanity, will be gratefully received.

Books received lately include "The Great Debate" by Rev. John W. Ring, Spiritualist, and Rev. J. W. Chism, Christian. It is an interesting debate, and will well serve as a text book for discussion of Spiritualism.

"Letters from Astrea," through the mediumship of Mrs. Mary T. Longley, will interest many.

Hudson Tuttle has also kindly sent some duplicates of his able productions. Our shelves are well employed by his works, and also the works of Dr. J. M. Peebles, A. J. Davis, Moses Hull, and others of our noble corps of intellectual giants.

Dr. P. C. Mills, one of the N. S. A. pensioners, and an able medium of many years' labor, has sent a copy of his "Modern Miracles." This is a record of wondrous psychic happenings.

Taken altogether, the N. S. A. library is of excellent assistance to the cause of Spiritualism.

Fraternally,
GEORGE W. KATES,
Secretary.

Father Ryan's Remarkable Poem.

To the Editor: I see by your issue of May 9 that you have taken the liberty of publishing a poem at the opening of Mrs. Russegue's address, and proper credit should be given. The poem was written by the Rev. Abram J. Ryan, a Catholic priest, a life-long resident of the city of Mobile, Alabama, and will be found in his volume of poems, published by John B. Flint, of Baltimore, in 1881. I also see that two of the most important verses, which I enclose to you, are omitted, and I think they are of importance to round out the poem. There should have been twelve verses, but you publish but ten. I enclose you the two verses omitted, the first of which should be the fourth verse, and the other the eleventh.

I think it is due to Father Ryan, who has been several years in his grave, that the correction should be made. The verses are as follows:

"And still did I pine for the perfect,
Yet I found the false with the true;
I sought 'mid the human for heaven,
But caught a mere glimpse of the blue;
And I wept when the clouds of the mortal
Veiled even that glimpse from my view."

"Do you long for a glimpse of the Valley,
Where the flowers in radiance bloom,
And the air is laden with odors,
That blend with their matchless perfume,
Where the soul is free from sadness,
And His love doth banish the gloom?"

There was not probably in all the South at the time of the civil war, a man more devoted to the cause of the Confederacy than Father Ryan of the Catholic priesthood. Whether it was the right course to pursue, I would not attempt to decide; yet I think we should give him credit for honest intentions. I also think that we should have greater charity for those who were born and reared in the land where slavery was looked upon by many as a divine institution, however much we may conclude that they were wrong. That Father Ryan was a sincere Catholic, and believed in his church as the true standard of religious faith, was also true. After the fortunate ending of that bloody strife, it was to be expected of him, as of most of those who gave so freely their all to the cause of the rebellion, that their disappointment was beyond any humiliation that could come to a people. He seemed to lose all interest in life excepting a desire to do for others, and lessen as far as was in his power, the effect of the blow that had fallen. Father Ryan was a poet of more than ordinary prominence, and all his life was giving to the world, in poetry and prose, thoughts that were uplifting and hopeful; but no one of his productions ever gave to the world a deeper thought and meaning, than his verse entitled, "The Song of the Mystic," which was written after the great shock of defeat had come to him and his people.

Justly Indignant.

A very little miss had been instructed by her mother that God was watchful of her every act; that he followed her wherever she went, and would severely punish her for any wrong. Sent on an errand to a neighbor's, the dog followed. Susie was indignant. Stamping her little foot she bade her brute companion to go back home. "It is bad enough to be watched by God wherever I go, and I don't want a pesky dog to keep his eye on me in addition." "And," says the report, "the dog sorrowfully retraced his steps homeward."

AN EARNEST EFFORT.

To Establish a Spiritualist Camp Ground in Texas.

Dear Spiritualist Friends: I do not come to you with an idle tale, nor to try to make you do what you do not desire to do, but I come to ask you to help with a cheerful heart in a cause which is far more important than most of us may think.

Now it is a matter of fact that one individual who has as much to do as I have, cannot carry on this work to a success without help from others. I have done too much for the advancement of Spiritualism at this place to sit still and not ask the co-operation of Spiritualists everywhere to make it a success; and without help from others I can not see how we can have a meeting at this camp this year. We have now got people here interested in Spiritualism, and if we fail to have a meeting here this year this interest is bound to grow more or less cold; and to think of all the work and effort which I have done here at this place to advance the cause of pure spiritual truths, to be lost, I can hardly bear the thought of letting it be.

Now I want to hear from every society in this state, what they are willing to do towards building a permanent camp ground here at this place. I would like to have the co-operation of all societies in this great work, and to this end I am willing to do more than my part to make it a success, and I have only a few replies to my article written some while back, in The Progressive Thinker, I will now make a proposition which I feel that many can accept, and which I hope they will do.

Now all who will send me just what they feel that they can easily spare, for the formula which I spoke of in the previous Progressive Thinker, i. e., the formula for making the liniment which I feel sure is worth many dollars to all those who ever use a liniment, and I will say further, that this formula has not been taken from any recipe book nor has it ever appeared in print.

Now all who will send me just what you can, I will not put any certain price on this recipe nor any price at all, but I will make this proposition: Every one who sends me money for the help of building up a camp ground and to make it a permanent success at this place, will receive this formula, and in addition to this I will give back your money thus paid, as the grounds make it back; so you will only be lending your money to help this great cause in a place where it will do a great good. Now put your heart in this work and send what you can, great or small, and we will establish a great centre for the cause of Spiritualism at this place.

CRUMBAUGH WILL IS BROKEN.

Spiritualists Lose Half Million Dollars Left for Church.

Bloomington, Ill., May 9.—A verdict was rendered by a jury in court here to-day setting aside the will of Banker Thomas Crumbaugh, who left half a million dollars to the Spiritualist church. The verdict followed a sensational trial, at which letters were produced to show that Crumbaugh had been unduly influenced by alleged mediums who claimed to be in communication with the spirit of the banker's infant son.—Chicago Record-Herald.

We have, in fact, to make our choice between science and suffering. It is only by wisely utilizing the gifts of science that we have any hope of maintaining our population in plenty and comfort. Science, however, will do this for us if we will only let her.—Sir John Lubbock.

THE BILL OF FARE.

Turkey, Turkey and Crow Mixed, and Crow.

When I began to investigate Spiritualism, before the Home Circle was started, I found three classes of public mediums: First, those who were living on the spiritual plane, whose minds were illuminated, and whose chief aim in life appeared to be the development of a larger spiritual life, with a view to helping humanity. It is blessed to think that this class is growing, and while we realize that none is perfect, and that it is more helpful to think of the good, still there are times when hindrances should be discussed with a view to progress.

Second, I found those not yet developed to the plane of illumination who for money were willing to inject fraud with some genuine manifestations.

Third, Charlatans, who advertise under the name of Spiritualism.

The three classes can be compared to an imaginary bill of fare on which is written, "TURKEY, TURKEY AND CROW MIXED," and "CROW."

It sometimes happens that after singing "Nearer, My God, to Thee," some honest people devour crow, believing it turkey—while angels weep.

The writer had a "test" where the Message had all the ear-marks of simply being a feat of memory, and in a few weeks thereafter, when a spirit controlled at my home I asked whether my impression was correct about that message, and the reply was: "Yes, Uncle Billy, that was not genuine and the spirits so impressed you at the time."

Another medium purported to produce type-written messages from my loved ones, some of whom controlled my wife and denied having any knowledge of such messages.

A prominent Spiritualist informed me that he did not believe there was a genuine public materializing medium in Washington.

Some of the "Turkey and Crow" kind of mediums are members in good standing and on the platform in organized Spiritualism, because they draw the crowd at 10 cents each. No wonder the organization does not grow; but Spiritualism, being true will grow.

If the ship of organized Spiritualism can detatch its barnacles and prove itself "worthy and well qualified, it will arise from its lethargy, and command the respect of the public and of the many Spiritualists who will not now become identified with said organization.

WM. H. ANDREWS,
Washington, D. C.

Dr. George A. Fuller.

The many friends of this noble worker for our Cause will be greatly shocked and deeply grieved to learn that he is now helpless upon a bed of pain, the result of a broken leg, caused by a fall upon the icy pavement. Dr. Fuller is one of Spiritualism's greatest teachers—a leader of leaders. The best years of his life have been unselfishly given to the service of Spiritualism, his soul's religion. He deserves well at the hands of his brethren everywhere. He has been an ever present help to them through his labors in behalf of the Cause they love, hence they owe much in return. It is not enough to say "I am sorry for him. I sympathize with him." It is rather our duty to share his pain, to carry his burden, to brighten his days of anguish as he lies prostrate in his home at Onset, Mass. It is the boast of Spiritualists that their religion is a practical one. Now is the time to prove that statement. Let us help him to bear his pain by proving to him that we appreciate his work for us and for Spiritualism.

Yours for humanity,
HARRISON D. BARRETT.

Girl Speaks In Strange Tongues

Remarkable Phenomenon Which Those Experiencing It Claim to Be the Power of God, the Holy Ghost—Skeptics by Demonstration Are Convinced—Considered From Religious or Scientific Standpoint Manifestations of Winifred M. Knight Are a Revelation—Astonishing Results From Translations of Strange Words.

It is undoubtedly a fact that in the course of time, the "ism" connected with Spirit Return will cease to exist, and the churches, liberalized, spiritualized, and wiser, will appropriate our phenomena, and thus be instrumental in doing a vast amount of good to the world. The manifestation related below as occurring at Newburg, Maine, originated in the spirit world, and are produced by spirits—and not by God. No clearer manifestation of spirit power and influence ever occurred through any medium than that exhibited by the frail little girl at Newburg. That Spiritualism in the main will be eventually absorbed by the churches is the opinion of many. This will not generally occur through anything connected with our Cause, but will be the direct result of the spirit control of some member of the church who will give expression to as much truth as those concerned can stand. When spirit manifestations occurred at an early day among the Shakers and the Wesley family, they were only the harbinger of what is happening to-day in the churches. With spirit manifestations occurring in religious bodies, the teachings of those in spirit life will be as now, more or less conflicting, but so long as those interested are engaged in humanitarian work, these divergent views from the spirit realm will do us no particular harm although they will be fruitful source of speculation and wonderment on the part of those who are extremely critical. Absolute truth is sometimes difficult to attain even in the spirit realms, and views there in regard to the existence of a God, are as diversified as on earth, hence we may look for a great increase in the number of bodies controlled measurably by spirits from different standpoints of belief and action.

... The most remarkable psychological-religious phenomena on record [as set forth in the Portland Maine, Express] has taken place, and is still taking place, in the town of Newburg, about twenty miles from Bangor, Me. This demonstration takes the form of speaking in tongues and has reached a state of intelligibility and accuracy never heretofore known. Allied with this demonstration is another manifestation which in the terminology of the religious adherents is called "slain."

The section of the country in which these phenomena have developed is a vast farming territory, and several of the adjoining towns hold quarterly conferences, at which the different denominations are represented. At one of these conferences held in Carmel during December, Winnifred M. Knight, a fourteen-year-old girl, was converted. At the succeeding quarterly conference, which convened in Corina, just nine weeks later to a day, she gave the first manifestation of the psychological state. While on the train going to the conference she was seized with a peculiar weakness, which so overcame her that she lay back in the seat and seemed partially to lose consciousness. She recovered, however, so that a half hour later, when she left the train, she was in nearly a normal condition. When the meeting had been in session a short time she fell into what seemed to those present to be a state of total unconsciousness—trance, which resembled a fainting spell. She remained in this condition for about an hour, but was, according to her own testimony, given later, in full consciousness, knowing everything that was said and done, but still unable to move or speak, a condition usually styled suspended animation. When she emerged from this state it was to arise and walk about the church talking IN TONGUES. After she had spoken a sentence in tongues the power of interpretation of this sentence was given to some woman in the audience, who also had elapsed into a TRANCE-LIKE STATE [sure evidence of spirit return]. Several manifestations of this kind occurred during the conference. Rev. Henry S. Woods, an evangelist, was present at this conference. His name is especially mentioned because he is the evangelist who is conducting the series of meetings in Newburg at which the writer of this article witnessed and studied the psychological phenomena.

Testimony of Witnesses.

According to his own testimony he was exceedingly skeptical in regard to the talking in tongues, and particularly concerning the interpretation; but as case followed case of it he became impressed, and he prayed that if this power of interpretation was really from God that it might be vouchsafed to him. At the present series of meetings in all cases which the writer witnessed he did the interpreting. It also ought to be added that at some of the early meetings of this evangelistic series the power of tongues has been given to others than Winifred Knight, while to several people the power of interpretation has been given; but of the nature of these manifestations only the testimony of people in attendance can be vouched for. Whether they would bear out the same testimony as the demonstrations of Winnifred Knight have under close psychological and linguistic observation it can never be stated, because at that time no one was working along that line. It is to be emphatically stated here that the meetings are not of a sensational nature in the least, although some of the more hysterical and irreligious members of the community have contributed some sensational features at times, and all the investigation has been carried on with the full consent of Mr. Woods and the people most deeply touched by the services. In fact, they are as eager to know whether the interpretation follow the text, whether the child is actually speaking in some tongue known to man, whether it is really THE VOICE OF GOD [only a spirit of course] calling to his people. At the close of the services they crowd about those working on the scientific side of the demonstrations and even stand on the backs of the seats in their eagerness to get closer and learn if one more translation has been verified, or if the child has not broken out in some known tongue, which will give conclusive proof of the verity of the religious exhortations given in the interpretations. Until one has seen and felt people thus crowd about, crying out almost for a proof of the immortality of their souls from the poor translator who with but frail human knowledge is wrestling with the problem one can never know the meaning of the words, "Wisdom is the principal thing; therefore get wisdom," written in Proverb. That this remarkable demonstration is the power of God, the Holy Ghost, as those experiencing it with one accord testify, the writer cannot affirm but will not deny. She will merely attempt to define it by elimination; in other words, define what it is in terms of what it is not. The investigations have disclosed the most remarkable features ever recorded in the talking in tongues, other cases of which have of course been noted at long intervals ever since their occurrence in ecclesiastical history. In regard to the psychological part of the question the most eminent authorities in the country have been consulted. For the language part, it is distinctly stated that no experts have been at work, and the translations are merely those worked out by the writer, with the assistance of some notes taken for her by Mr. George P. Leavitt of Dixmont.

Two Psychological States.

The two psychological states which have been demonstrated are as follows, the latter one, which religiously is known as "slain," being only secondary, however.

Winnifred Knight, the child who is giving the great demonstration of talking in tongues, is a frail slip of a girl, just an average child of her fourteen years, lovable and sweet, with not a touch of self-consciousness or sense of her remarkable gift. When not in this state, she talks and acts like the average child, with only a possible hint now and then that she is not altogether like other children. But this all might be reasonably attributed to the fact that she is the child of an invalid mother, that she has had to take on cares and perform heavy work far beyond her years or strength, and has had naught of real childhood, Such abnormal conditions result either in a dull, sodden depression of childlike exuberance or in the development of a kind of higher life, which closely borders onto spirituality. In no other way has the surroundings of the child contributed to her sudden development of mediumistic power. Her educational advantages have been most restricted, being limited to an attendance at the district schools of her town, and that only intermittently, owing to the illness of her mother. She has never even attended a school where languages are taught, nor has she been a resident of a community where foreign languages are spoken, such as is the case in manufacturing sections. Not by unconscious imitation does she speak in a foreign language. Nor is there any possibility of her having heard foreign languages spoken, so that the sub-conscious self can have registered the impressions and now be giving them forth, as has been noted scientifically several times, when in case of delirium a patient has spoken fluently a language which he has never studied. But in all such cases it has been traced back to a possible hearing of the spoken languages, which the sub-conscious self has made its own; and since in cases of delirium this sub-conscious self, or subliminal consciousness, is in ascendancy, it is readily seen how such demonstrations occur.

Previous Conditions of the State.

For some time previous to speaking in tongues the child, for such only she is, begins to tremble, at first only slightly. The tremulous motion starts in the right hand, and resembles a continuous, even vibratory movement. This is followed by intense physical resistance, seemingly. The mouth is greatly contorted, as if the body were being racked with pain. The eyes open and close, the balls of them seeming to roll upward and become set. The struggle is, to all appearances, very much like that experienced in going under an anaesthetic, the long, deep breaths of partial anaesthesia occurring often. When completely under the power of obsession, the look of obsession, the look of suffering passes and the child's face, which always becomes pallid, takes on an almost beatific expression. Her eyes are closed, and about the mouth there is the smile which is sometimes seen on the face of one etherealized in death; the right arm is uplifted, and still trembling slightly. Sometimes she walks several minutes, and once as long as half an hour, before beginning to talk. Then her voice starts with a kind of low cadence and she begins to speak in the unknown tongues. After she has spoken one sentence it is given to some one (in all of the cases which the writer witnessed it was the evangelist, Mr. Woods) to give the interpretation. The state into which he goes before interpreeting is not at all like that of the child. His eyes become closed quietly and peacefully, however, as in a sleep, there being no sign of physical struggle or suffering. His right arm is elevated and trembles with the same vibratory motion as the child's when he begins to walk about the church, following her closely. At times the child seems to totter and has several times fallen as if in extreme weakness, but according to her own statement this is not the case, but it is rather due to the fact that her limbs, in fact her entire frame, is at times trembling like the elevated right arm. This state lasts anywhere from about a half hour, as in the cases under study, and five hours the length of the first manifestation at Corinna. When coming out of this state the child is for five minutes or so extremely weak, but after that she feels no effect from it whatsoever. She has absolutely no remembrance of the state in which she is while talking in tongues. There are, however, one or two words and syllables which she has said many times that she recalls, and she has asked to learn what they mean and if they are of any known tongue. The convulsive movements of the mouth, and she is trying to eject this air and physical pain, are not such she states. Between her lips there seems to be an air space, say three or four inches, and she is trying to eject that air and close her lips (a similar sensation is often experienced in taking gas or ether) and it is not till she feels that she has done this and she is able to close her mouth that she begins to speak in tongues.

"Slain."

The allied manifestation, "slain," which has been experienced by about twelve people, is simply being heavily thrown to the floor [through spirit power]. The subject is perfectly conscious, but cannot move or speak. He remains in this usually about an hour, and invariably comes out of it with the cry, "It is the power of God [simply only another spirit manifestation]. Sometimes while in this state the subject cries out to the Deity and exhorts, but this is the exception. This manifestation has in almost all cases fallen on those who went to ridicule the meeting or at least to criticise it. Two clergymen, the Rev. Mr. Tolman and the Rev. Charles Lake, who objected to the nature of the meetings, believing the demonstrations sensational and tending to commonize religion, are the most important ones who have experienced this manifestation. They have both of them come out of the state testifying that it was the power of God [it is only the power of the spirit].

Some of the congregation have become frightened at the unusual demonstrations and have run from the church. It seems, so far as personal investigation and the testimony of witnesses and subjects indicate that the scoffers are the ones to be seized with the manifestations recorded, with the exception of talking in tongues, and this has been given only to professed Christians. One man, who had come with a neighbor merely to be amused, was seized with a peculiar manifestation, resembling the shock from an electric battery, and when touched transmitted a strong electric current.

Significant Facts of Translation.

The writer has been able to work out some remarkably significant points in the translations or interpretations of the tongues. Of course the fact that the child speaks very low at times, is always walking about the church, so that often she is some distance from the one taking notes, added to the fact that at the first two demonstrations no notes were taken lest it be displeasing to those conducting the services, contributes a great deal to the meagerness of the results, which the writer believes would have been much more astonishing had all things been favorable for a closer study. Following are just some of the phrases, words, syllables, and terminations which have stood investigation and point to a theory of syntax, conjugation and etymology, many times consistent with the interpeetration. It must be remembered that the sounds have been taken only phonetically and not always according to the phonetics of any one language, but rather according to the phonetics of the language from which they seem to come. Words and phonetic sounds of eight different languages have been detected by those who have witnessed the demonstrations thus far—Swedish (detected by a native Swede, who testified that the translation was correct), Hebrew, Sanscrit, Greek, Latin, French (Canadian), Spanish and Italian. This fact of itself would not prove much were it not reinforced by other facts, as some such sounds might be detected even from jargon, and the knowledge of no one system of phonetics upon which the language or languages uttered is based, would make this mere inference rather than scientific deduction. The sounds are many of them that of the Hebrew, the terminations pointing strongly to that language. All cases here considered were spoken by Winnifred M. Knight and interpreted by Rev. Harry S. Woods. The most remarkable sentence in tongues was "——kara sebachthand," interpreted, "He is calling thee, why wilt thou forsake him?" The first word, indicated by the dash, sounded like the Greek word "toi" but the sound was very indefinite. The two words known, however, are Hebrew words, and the interpretation is a correct translation. An expression which occurs with great frequency is (spelled phonetically according to English) "antecorinian sena," and was invariably interpreted, "He is coming soon." It occurred three times in succession at the beginning of a sentence, then later in the middle of a sentence, and still later at the close of a sentence, the interpretation always following the same order in translation. Two more verifications of this interpretation have came to the writer since making her own investigations. Another form, "corinian," interpreted in every instance, "He will appear," has occurred frequently. The word "sena" is always interpreted "now," or some word with the same signification, no matter in what part of the sentence it occurs.

It will be noted in the above forms "antecorinian" and "corinian" the "rinian" is common to both and seems to denote future tense, in both cases being so interpreted. It might be added that these are only two of several instances where this "eri" occurs with future signification. The termination "an" is common to many of the verbs used in the tongues and is a Hebrew verb termination. It may be readily seen that this "eri" can be traced to the future signification of the Latin future terminations, "ero," "eris," "erit," "ieres," "iere;" to the Italian future, "ero," "erai," "eras," "era."

The verb "tenesa" was used, interpreted "hold." This may be traced to the "ten," with the significance of "hold" in the Latin "teneo," the Spanish "tener" and the Italian "tenere." The verb "entrara" was used in the tongues, interpreted by "we will go marching." There is a Spanish verb "entrar" which means "to enter," or "to go marching." Again it may be seen that the "ara" is translated by the future and is allied to the futures above quoted. The Latin word "amate" was used in the tongues and translated "love ye." All the imperatives, so far as detected, ended in "a," which is an imperative termination in several languages. Sometimes the child sings in tongues, the music being in the nature of a chant, and then the text is always in the form of verse. (This does not prove too much for J. M. Buckley of New York, who has done much investigating along the line of talking in tongues, claims that he himself by automatic syllabic suggestion has been able to gabble jargon in perfect meter.) The interpretation, however, also comes in verse. The only case of singing in tongues observed resembled the French-Canadian. The word "Manito," meaning "God" in Indian, and also carried over into French Canadian, which is made up quite as much of Indian as French, was used and was always interpreted "God." Of course the above data is fragmentary, but accurate so far as observed, and would point to a consistency at least between the tongue or tongues and the interpretations. The most convincing fact, perhaps, is the fact that wherever certain expressions occur, whether at the beginning, middle or end of a sentence, they always have the same translation. This would completely dispel the idea of collusion.

Scientific Theory of the Phenomenon.

As scientifically classified this psychological demonstration, according to the greatest authority in this country, Dr. William James, of Harvard University, whom the writer interviewed in person and before whom all the evidence here presented has been laid, might be called a MEDIUM TRANCE. It is not an induced condition, only so far as social conditions make it so, but is a MEDIUMISTIC STATE. The subject herself is possessed of another knowledge, a second knowledge, which comes into control during the manifestation. This knowledge is parasitic, it can be controlled, and even addressed. The medium in all cases observes decorum; it wants to please the other self, it wants to be liked, and in other ways possesses the characteristics of the normal self. This accounts for the fact that the demonstrations are timed so that they never interfere with the rest of the service, a circumstance that is often questioned by the skeptic. The fact that the utterings of this medium are prophetic is not unlike most mediumistic communications, whether religious of otherwise. This "other knowledge," which constitutes the mediumistic control, is parasitic upon "all knowledge;" its utterings always transcend the normal knowledge, always point to higher things. If at any time they do not, or if they cause the subject to suffer or become weakened, they can and should be made to cease. This may be done by the subject herself or by another person's talking to the medium when it has possession of the subject. In such cases as the one under observation, so long as it does not affect the health of the child, it should be encouraged because of the possible revelations into mediumistic power. This interpreter is under the medium which possesses the subject doing the talking in tongues. Those others who give the same manifestation have learned that they have the power through witnessing the demonstration of the child, the same as people often learn by attending Spiritualistic seances that they too have mediumistic power. It is not imitative, but rather in the line of stimulation or revelation of latent power in the observer.

Auto-hypnotism is another term which might be applied to the manifestation,—that condition in which the subject hypnotizes himself. He may at the same time affect others, making the interpretations by another possible.

The writer here wishes to state that the child, Winnifred Knight, gave a manifestation of the psychological phenomenon while sitting with her in the parlor of the house where she was stopping. There was no one present to whom the condition could be traced. She was talking naturally, and this time went into the state so quickly that the writer did not detect it till she was fairly in it, although sitting close to her and engaging in conversation with her. This time she did her own interpreting, giving a sentence in tongues, followed by a sentence of interpreting.

Other cases of talking in tongues have been previously recorded, but none in which translation has seemed so reasonable. The means of investigating them are difficult and must be pursued persistently else they avail nothing to religion or science. Along the Pacific Coast this winter there have been a number of demonstrations of talking in tongues; but the ministers discouraged it, believing that it led to no great spiritual upliftment, although in all cases they admitted that it started in some one exceedingly spiritual; but curious to note a pride in the gift and even a sense of rivalry crept in, thus degrading it. In these cases in the West no scientific investigations have been made so far as known.

Other Scientific Authorities.

J. M. Buckley, of New York, above quoted, says in regard to his investigations of speaking in tongues, "In no case did any unknown tongue contain a requiring root not recognizable as belonging to some known tongue." He calls it the "operation of the law of spontaneous syllabic suggestion."

Le Baron, another great investigator along these lines, says "Consonantal and vowel combinations and their intuitive vocal adjustments may be startlingly scientific hints of mental force latent in everybody and which, if studied, generalized, verified, systematized, and seriously investigated by philosophers, might prove incalculable benefit to the human race, which could find no encouragement for expression in the nineteenth century, because of the fierce mocking intolerance of the conservative dogmas of the age."

Whether one considers the remarkable demonstration of talking in tongues from a religious or scientific standpoint, it is a revelation to man of a great beyond as yet only dimly known to him. Its beauties far exceed the richest hues of the summer's sunset or the late autumn's lavish coloring. Everywhere we get faint glints of them in song or in poetry or on canvas, but these are but reflections or now and then a mirage. Not till we study and not mock, believe and not unbelieving condemn, can we lay hold of the treasures that are rightfully ours.

EDITH BURNHAM.

AN EARNEST PLEA FOR THE BIBLE.

In Which Its Inspiring Truths Are Impressively Pointed Out.

To the Editor: With your kind permission I just want to say a few words in the kindliest of spirit to those of your contributors who so often assail bitterly the Bible and the so-called Christian religion. While it must not, or reasonably should not, be assumed that the Bible is infallible in its present arrangement, because it has been so arranged through the instrumentality of human intellect, always imperfect at best, yet it is a fact, not capable of contradiction, that within its pages, even with all their too plainly discernible errors of translation, or chronology and locality, may be found the expression of principles which, if conscientiously followed by the human race, would lead to a far more happy and uplifted condition than now exists. A student of the Bible, if in his heart or inner self truly desirous of attaining high ideals—I had better say high SPIRITUAL IDEALS—will find much that must on its face be received as inspirational teaching of a high order, and allowing for all the imperfections of the instrumentality through which it has come, such as the educational, religious, or social environments of the instrument at the time of the inspiration, and the still greater liability of error in translation, down to the present day, it must be admitted that its truth is self-evident.

Why should we seek to destroy the comfort that millions of tired and perplexed souls to-day find in what they understand to be the promises of God to help in time of trouble; to comfort, as death claims a loved one; to protect from the selfishness and hatred of those who know no God?

Lest we can offer something better, something holier, something infinitely wiser, of ourselves, would it not be better to let them rest in the comfort and help therein obtained, the while we as individuals look about us to see if WE are doing anything to gladden a sorrowing heart, and to wipe away the blinding tears of grief over the parting with loved ones?

It seems to me that the mission of a true Spiritualist should be to do these things, having charity at least, if we, who ourselves may not possibly have reached infallibility in understanding, find others thinking differently on these things, for their, to us, mistaken conception of truth. We may all unite in the most emphatic denunciation of a palpable wrong or a fraudulent teaching of error disguised as truth for commercial or political gain, but I beg of you all not to discredit EVERYTHING in the BIBLE because of the imperfect instruments through which its TRUTHS were given.

DEAFNESS

Successfully Treated

By the Simplest Methods Yet Discovered.

Ninety-five percent of the cases of deafness brought to our attention are the result of chronic catarrh of the throat and middle ear. The air passages become clogged by catarrhal deposits, stopping the action of the vibratory bones. Until these deposits are removed relief is impossible. The inner ear cannot be reached by probing or spraying; hence the inability of specialists to always effect a cure. Neither can ear drums cure deafness. But there is a scientific treatment for deafness and catarrh which is demonstrated every day by the use of Actina. The vapor generated in the Actina passes through the Eustachian tubes into the middle ear, removing the catarrhal obstructions and loosens up the bones (hammer, anvil and stirrup) in the inner ear, making them respond to the vibration of sound. Actina is also very successful in relieving ringing noises in the head. We have known people afflicted with this distressing trouble for years to be entirely relieved by a few week's use. Actina has always been very successful in the treatment of hay fever, asthma, bronchitis, sore throat, weak lungs, colds, headache and other troubles that are directly or indirectly due to catarrh. Actina will be sent on trial, postpaid. Write us about your case. Our advice will be free as well as a valuable book—Prof. Wilson's Treatise on Disease. Correspondent writes: "The Golden Rule Spiritualist Society is moving slowly but surely onward. Our membership is still increasing, and our audience is holding its own with home talent. Mrs. Nora E. Hill has occupied our rostrum for he past three weeks and will fill it again Sunday evening, May 10. On May 17 Harry E. Burgess (brother of Dr. C. A. Burgess), will speak, his subject being "The American Indian and the Original God." Something that will be of interest to all who may hear him; and on Sunday evening, May 24, Mrs. J. L. Fravel of Austin, will deliver the address. This talented lady has been in the hands of the unseen forces since she was twelve years of age. Also, on May 24 we will have a musical treat. Prof. W. W. Kirtland and his good wife, have promised to render some of their highly appreciative music—violin and piano selections. These good people have given our society several such demonstrations before, and our audience will appreciate their sweet music. Everybody welcome."

Mrs. Nora E. Hill has moved from 705 West Madison st., to No. 9 DeKalb St., flat A, where she will continue to hold her Thursday evening circles: On May 21 there will be a benefit circle held at the above number. A large audience is looked for, to fill her spacious rooms.

A social under the auspices of the Golden Rule Society will be held on Friday evening, May 13, at the home of Mrs. M. Avery, 102 S. Oakley boul. These socials at her home are always conducive to a good time for everybody, for there is always a smile on the face of the hostess, and that ever inspires, ever guarantees a soul feast and feast of the mortal, including 'potato pie.'

Miss Louise G. Loebel, Secretary of the Wisconsin State Spiritualists' Association, writes that she has changed her address in Milwaukee to 275 23rd st. Her correspondents will please bear this in mind and address her—275 23rd St., Milwaukee, Wis. She reports Spiritualism still on the move in the Badger State.

Mrs. Catherine McFarlin, the lecturer, is now located at her home, Plainview, Minn., where she can be addressed.

W. W. Aber writes as follows, from Pueblo, Col., where he has been at work: "I am now open for all engagements, including camps and otherwise, for materialization and platform test work. Also, my wife for inspirational lectures and trumpet work. Those interested in these phases may address us in the next ten days at 616 Santa Fe avenue, Pueblo, Col."

Thos. Collar writes from Sturgis Mich.: "The Harmonial Society of Spiritualists will celebrate the Fifty-first Anniversary in the Free Church, Sturgis, Mich., Saturday and Sunday, June 20 and 21, 1908. Speakers engaged are Will J. Erwood, Battle Creek, Mich.; Mrs. D. A. Morrill of Grand Rapids, Mich., and Dr. J. M. Peebles, Battle Creek, invited as a guest. All have accepted and will be present."

G. W. Kates, Secretary of the N. S. A. writes the following to J. W. Ring: "I have read the "Ring-Chism Debate" and enjoyed it much. You did well; and you met a good debater, albeit he was, as usual with a good(?) Christian, rather personal and abusive. I am glad you carried yourself with dignity. The book of debate makes a good reference for future debaters. I have placed in in the N. S. A. Library. I cheerfully recommend the book to all readers who are seeking important information with regard to the truths and mission of Spiritualism. It is quite a text-book; and I have already used it for reference a couple of times in public lectures. It is an aid in that direction."

Carroll I. Case writes from Three Rivers, Mich.: "The Cause in Three Rivers is enjoying great prosperity. We have found in our midst a very good materializing medium, not a medium by profession. The medium, Mr. Lewis Wheaton, has been having same very good seances, and many have been led thereby to a knowledge of the truth. The seances have been private, having been held only in the presence of immediate friends, and some most excellent and satisfactory tests have been received. Many have been able to recognize their friends, and many helpful and inspiring messages have been received. Our medium is yet young in the work and the results that will be attained from his mediumship in the future, cannot now be foretold. We are also favored by having in our little city a trumpet-medium, Mr. William Atkins, who is also doing a good work. The number of people coming into our ranks is constantly increasing, and we hope that we will soon be able to have an organized society, and to be affiliated with the N. S. A. We gladly welcome the weekly visits of The Progressive Thinker to our city, and appreciate the good work it is doing and the campaign it is waging against fraud and legerdemain."

T. J. McKeron writes from San Diego, Cal.: "I feel that I must send you a few words from San Diego this beautiful first Sunday in May. One year ago we had our dearly beloved John W. Ring with us, and that meant work for others as well as the preacher-man, and he was always busy, knowing that he could not be with us in body, yet knowing that he could and would be with us in spirit, so some of the good sisters put their heads together and built a Floral Ring, just 2 inches in diameter, and swung it to the chandelier over the rostrum, and that with other decorations was voted the finest floral decorations that our beautiful Temple has ever had. The work in the Temple is progressing very nicely under the ministrations of Mrs. Katie Huessman-Harveston, who is under an engagement of four months as lecturer and message-bearer."

The following is clipped from the Grand Rapids, Mich., Herald: "Of broad, all-embracing, most catholic creed is Will V. Nicum of Dayton, O., lecturer, whom the Scisty of Psychical Research has engaged to address them during the next month. "There is a reason for all creeds and all shades of belief," said Mr. Nicum last night. "Each will be found, on study, to be the sort most suited for some particular group of people. Yet all, I firmly believe, are working to the same goal, which is the attainment of a higher plane than the one we now inhabit. Mr. Nicum's topics are not of the everyday sort. That is, not of the sort of diet the Psychical Researchers feed on. They take you up and on into higher planes of thought than the average man reaches for everyday consumption. 'Whatever is, is right,'' for instance, was the topic of his Sunday night address. "Life and its Great Purposes," was the topic for that afternoon. Next Sunday afternoon he will lecture on "Three Great Epochs in the World's History." and in the evening he will speak on "Exoteric vs. Esoteric." Though not large in membership the Psychical Research society numbers earnest thinkers and they have grappled with some of the biggest problems of the human race during the few years of their existence. The officers of the club are as follows: President, R. F. Corwin; vice-president, James E. Walker; treasurer, C. L. Atwood. Mr. Nicum is capable of doing a most excellent work. His address while at Grand Rapids is as follows: 580 Terrace avenue, care of B. F. Corwin."

W. E. Howard of Jackson, Mich., writes approvingly of the good work done there by Frank T. Ripley.

G. H. Sidwell writes: "The Psychic Society held its regular Sunday evening meeting at Wilcox Hall, May 3. There was as usual a large gathering of worthy workers, deep thinking, well-wishing friends and investigators of Spiritualism. This is one of the meeting places where from the time the meeting begins until it closes, there is a complete feeling of peace and harmony. We were again addressed by Mr. H. F. Arnold in one of his characteristic, convincing lectrues. We also had the pleasure of hearing that well-known medium, Mrs. Oswald, who gave a splendid example of psychic reading of articles given her. Mrs. Campbell, another well known medium, gave clairvoyant messages. Our own pastor, Mrs. Isa Cleveland, gave her usual ballot message reading's which always bring comfort and consolation to those asking advice and help from spirit friendls. Brother and Mrs. Kirchner were present and Brother Kirchner gave a short interesting talk on the lyceum work which the Spiritualists' League has undertaken. The Church of the Psychic forces is now organized with Brother McLean, president; Brother Sidwell, secretary; Brother Cleveland, treasurer; trustees, Brother Arnold, Sister Russell, Sister Hooper. The impression seems to have gotten out that since this organization is completed Sister Isa Cleveland will not take that interest that she has taken before, and will not be present as heretofore with us. We take this opportunity of denying this, and in making the assertion that this organization has only rallied around her as a staunch and true following, to help her complete the work in which she is engaged at Wilcox Hall. All true Spiritualists are invited to attend these meetings and help us in this grand work."

Mrs. Bertha Stark writes from Santa Barbara, Cal.: "I enjoy reading The Progressive Thinker very much, and have done as much as I could to bring the light to others. Knowing this beautiful truth, it has been a very great help to me. It has been my Star of Hope in the many storms of my life. I have had my husband's father materialize to me twice, and others as well. I had a dream a few nights ago, of an accident. The next morning I saw my dream acted out to perfection. Some of my church friends say I certainly do Spiritualism justice."

Mrs. May A. Price's permanent address is Morton, N. Y. She will make short engagements with societies in that part of the country until she goes to Lake Brady the 12th of July. She speaks there July 12 and 19, and at Hamilton, Ont., during August and September."

Correspondent writes: "Deputations from the Frances E. Willard health circle, organized in the ethereal world, will meet with mortals in your own home every Thursday from 3 to 9 p. m., for the purpose of organizing and maintaining a home circle, wherein spirits disembodied may have an opportunity to communicate with mortals. Address, by letter only, enclosing self-addressed and stamped envelope, Mrs. Elsa Hornbeck, 500 Fullerton avenue, Chicago, Ill."

Miss L. M. Schanbacher, the M. P. Institute student who spoke at the Illinois State Spiritualists' Association convention in Handel hall last February, and who graduates this month, will occupy the rostrum of the Progressive Spiritualists' Society, 183 E. North avenue, Chicago, Sundays, May 24 and 31, the eighth anniversary of this society. Come, everybody, and listen to the eloquent words of this gifted young lady who has been educated into the work from our own institute. Give her a full house.

We will have services every Sunday at 4 p. m. until 7 p. m. Residence, 44 E. 31st street."

Edward G. Jansc, secretary, writes: "At the annual meeting of the Church of the Soul, May 6, it was voted and unanimously carried to tender to you most hearty thanks for your valuable services to the church during the last year of its grand and noble work for the uplifting and betterment of humanity. It is, therefore, a great pleasure to me, as its secretary, to notify you of this resolution."

John W. Clay, of Sutton, N. H., writes as follows of the Sunapee Lake Camp Meeting for 1908, at Blodgett's Landing, N. H.: "The committee having in charge the season of 1908, are seeking to bring "light more light" to those who assemble here year by engaging first-class speakers, Edgar W. Emerson, of Manchester, N. H.; Emma Bascom Smith, of Lawrence, and Geo. W. Kates, of Washington, D. C., secretary of the N. S. A., and his wife, Zaida B. Kates, are to serve us, the two latter for two weeks, commencing Aug. 15. We extend a cordial invitation to all Spiritualists and investigators to come and hear what these workers in the Cause of Truth have to give, and enjoy with us the surrounding beauties of nature. The lake, its waters clearest of all New England lakes, twelve hundred feet above the sea level, is situated on the Concord and Clairmont division of the Boston & Maine Railroad, twenty-five miles from Concord, N. H. We have purchased land and are preparing to erect a spiritual temple in the near future. The hotel has been leased by a gentleman of many years' experience, who will give his kindest attention to the needs of his guests."

Hattie F. R. Peet, Corresponding secretary, writes: "The Band of Harmony held its 24th annual meeting and election of officers at the home of Mr. and Mrs. William Richmond, Rogers Park, on Thursday afternoon, and evening, May 7. A goodly number braved 'wind and tide,' to be present on this lovely occasion, for none can afford to miss the annual 'reunion and love feast' vouchsafed at these gatherings at the home of our pastor. At 6 p. m., all gathered around the tables most bountifully spread for our repast. In the evening the election of officers took place, and resulted as follows: President, Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond; vice-president, Mrs Emma A. Ellis; secretary, Mrs. Hattie F. R. Peet; treasurer, Mrs. Nettie J. Ashton. It is with regret that we say good-bye to Mrs. Harry Goodrich, who has so long served as our vice-president in the Band of Harmony, as she and her life-companion are soon to leave Chicago for residence in New Haven, Ct. A vote of thanks for faithful service, and expressions of regret, that she is so soon to leave us, were tendered her by the Band of Harmony. It was carried that the usual 'Summer Socials' be held during the coming season at the homes of the members. The first one is to be held at the home of Mrs. Emma A. Ellis, No. 478 Fullerton Boul., on Thursday, May 21, and will consist of a lunch and card pary. Lunch will be served from 12 to 1 p. m. Each lady is expected to bring lunch for herself and friends. Cards from 2 till 4 p. m. Score-cards 25 cents; coffee checks 10 cents. All cordially invited; come and bring your friends, and have a good time."

G. L. Reynolds writes from Auburn, N. Y.: "Enclosed find the $1.00 for the renewal of my subscription to The Progressive Thinker that is justly to stand champion as the world's best paper. I have taken it for many years and shall continue to do so as long as I can raise the $1.00. You may remember, that several years ago I was in your office, and had the model of my Nailless Horse Shoe with me. Well, I have since been perfecting it, till it is now a complete practical success, and only needs the money to market it to make it one of the greatest financial successes of the age, and my desire has been Chicago as the place to do it. Because your city is full of the men of the right class."

She had one of the purest faces, and such a sweet personality, so cheerful, in spite of blindness. Such characters help to redeem the cause of Spiritualism, and help us to have faith in the ultimate redemption of the race. We have progressive young Universalist ministers all through this section. The people at large are becoming much more liberal in their views."

On Friday, May 1, at Moline, Ill., there occurred the funeral of Mons Olson. The transition service at his handsome home was conducted by Mrs. Alice C. Ferd. C. Suhrer writes: "The services of the Fraternal Order of Spiritualists Sunday, May 3, were most liberally attended. It was medium's day, and our message bearers received recognition and honors, both afternoon and evening. It is always pleasing to see honor given to whom honor is due, and it is with pardonable pride that we call your attention to the hodest and unquestionable message work of our corps of faithful workers. This day was said by many to have been the most successful in many respects. Much interest was manifested by many strangers who had for the first time attended a Spiritualist service. We are more than pleased to say the Fraternal Order is still on the up-grade, and since being chartered under the state laws is receiving much helpful recognition and assistance from people of influence. Our concert at 7:30 with Miss Bess Johnson, our soloist, and other talent, is a pleasing, exhilarating diversion—always looked forward to and enjoyed. The officers of the State Association present were Dr. T. Wilkins, president, Miss Eugenia Rouble, secretary, and Dr. G. A. Burgess, trustee, and who is also president of the Chicago Spiritualists' League, accompanied by Mrs. B. Hilbert and Miss Bertha Hansen. The little hall (in the basement of her spacious home) 414 Waveland Avenue, wes very beautifully decorated with fragrant flowers and plants and the fragrance lent spirituality to the sublime spiritual exercises. A feast followed, such as only Mrs. Schwahn and her corps of aids know how to set forth, decorated with a bouquet—a rose and a fern—at each plate. All in all the evening was an extraordinarily enjoyable one and will long be remembered by all in attendance. All retired at a late hour with blessings upon the newly ordained pastor."

No Pardon for Sin

To the Editor: In reference to the alleged great salvation in the Life Beyond of the late electrocuted murderer, Gillett, who murdered his finance, Grace Brown, I have this to say:

If the Christian theologian who pronounced Gillett's sin of murder, divinely pardoned, was theologically right, then the Scriptures, which are the supposed basis of Christian theology, must be theologically wrong. For is it not written, "No murderer shall enter the kingdom of God?" Thereby inferring that the sin of murder is one among the unpardonables for which there is no forgiveness.

In my opinion, as a layman, there is too much maudlin sentiment among Christian theologians in holding out hope, at the eleventh hour to lifelong hardened sinners, liars, scandalmongers, murderers and others, promising salvation by simply having them profess to believe, confess and "come to Jesus," forgetting that it is written "no such shall enter the kingdom of God."

Christian theologians are, in my opinion, responsible for much of the world's iniquity. For instance, the promise of pardon gives only encouragement to more iniquity and hence there is more sinning, and more wickedness in Christian lands than in any other.

For wilful sin, I believe, there is no forgiveness. Every wrong like every vice, must have its own punishment, and no one can atone for the sin of another. If so, where would be the principle of divine justice?

The Christian theologian's doctrine of the forgiveness of sin, to my mind, is a delusion and a snare.

Better—far better—have sinners understand that their sin will find them out and that the soul that sinneth—wilfully sinneth—will surely die. DR. R. GREER.

Spiritualism a Religion?

Of course it is, and the "Alma-Mater" of religions at that. Why? Because its ablest exponents and representatives are those who have graduated and grown old in theology and churches. They are hoary bearded veterans who are dissatisfied with their life-long worship in orthodox creeds, which have taught them only secular, worldly belief, affording no comfort or knowledge of the life beyond. Upon the threshold of eternity they are seeking blindly for light from their loved ones who have gone beyond; at last they turn in desperation, and welcome the OPEN DOOR of Spiritualism, the "only" demonstrative religion which enables one to communicate with the so-called dead, leading one fearlessly and rejoicingly to their spirit home.

How can such sacred power be termed anything but "religion," which means freedom to worship according to the most intelligent dictates of the conscience.

Spiritualists hold no monopoly on the sacred truth of revealing messages from spirit friends. This gift of intercommunion between the two worlds is neither uncanny nor unnatural, and is open to every human being.

If you take Spiritualism out of the Bible and out of the churches, what have you left? Just the same empty SHELL WHICH IS VACATED AFTER THE SPIRIT LEAVES THE BODY, and the same cheerless doctrine with which the churches have fed you during the past centuries.

A powerful factor in our belief is the happy, soulful experience depicted upon the faces of all true Spiritualists. You may enter any other religious organization in the universe, and never see assembled workers for spiritual upliftment who portray their souls in their unrestrained, hopeful and satisfied countenance, which depict no fear of an uncertain future. We know that when we leave this body (die, as church people say,) we enter into a rejuvenated form.

Death is but a journey to another country, and without effort, or baggage, and there is what we have earned while sojourning here.

PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

Geo. W. Carpenter of Encinitus, Cal., passed to the higher life April 25th, at the age of 89 years. He was a devout Spiritualist and worker for nearly fifty years, spreading the truth and doing good for the Cause in every way. Rev. Katie Heussmann-Harveston, pastor of Spiritual Temple, conducted the transition services. The brother leaves a wife who is also on the borderland.

Rev. Katie Harveston writes from San Diego, Cal.: "The good work is steadily going on at the Temple here at San Diego; services at 11 a. m., and 8 p. m.; lyceum at 10 a. m. Every Sunday the evening services draw full houses. My spiritual guides are doing a fine work here along the inspirational and message lines. The Cause at San Diego is certainly progressing."

Mrs. Mary E. Manly passed to spirit life at her home in Andover, Ohio, on the afternoon of April 28 after a brief illness; surrounded by her friends she passed peacefully over. A lifelong Spiritualist. We commemorated her transition on May 1. The exercises were beautiful, the attendance large. Beautiful bouquets, buds and blossoms were everywhere in evidence. D. A. Herrick officiated. He touched the hearts of all present; indeed a beautiful lesson for us all, was given by him, one that will bear fruit some day. The singing by the local quartet was worthy of special mention. The songs so appropriate and so beautifully rendered did much to perfume the atmosphere with comfort. JOHN WALLACE.

THE PSYCHOGRAPH

OR

Dial Planchette.

This instrument is substantially the same as that employed by Prof. Hare in his early investigations. In its improved form it has been before the public for more than twelve years, and in the hands of thousands of persons has proved its superiority over the Planchette, and all other instruments which have been brought out in imitation, both in regard to certainty and correctness of the communications received by its aid, and as a means of developing mediumship.

Do you wish to investigate Spiritualism?

Do you wish to develop Mediumship?

Do you desire to receive communications?

The Psychograph is an invaluable assistant. A pamphlet with full directions for the

with every instrument. Many who were not aware of their mediumistic gift, have, after a few sittings, been able to receive delightful messages. A volume might be filled with commendatory letters. Many who began with it as an amusing toy, found that the intelligence controlling it knew more than themselves, and became converts to Spiritualism.

Capt D. B. Edwards, Orient, N. Y., writes: "I had communications (by the Psychograph) from many other friends, even from old settlers whose gravestones are moss-grown in the old yard. They have been highly satisfactory, and proved to me that Spiritualism is indeed true, and the communications have given my heart the greatest comfort in the severest loss I have had of son, daughter, and their mother."

Dr. Eugene Crowell, whose writings have made his name familiar to those interested in psychic matters, writes as follows: "I am much pleased with the Psychograph. It is very simple in principle and construction, and I am sure must be far more sensitive to spiritual power than the one now in use. I believe it will generally supersede the latter when its superior merits become known."

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

This department is under the management of
HUDSON TUTTLE.
Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Everyone has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected. HUDSON TUTTLE.

N.—Q.—I once met with a poem by Nettie Maynard, entitled "To My Mother," and would very much like to know where I can obtain it.

A.—This beautiful poem is said to have been given by spirit influence, through Nettie Maynard, one of the most remarkable mediums. She was the medium through whom Lincoln obtained many messages, and on whom he placed great reliance.

The poem is rare, and I give it entire for the benefit of the readers of The Progressive Thinker.

Three times, dear, the roses have blossomed
And faded our faces between—
Three times o'er your still heart, dear mother,
The grass on your grave has grown green—
And my lips wear the smile I have taught them,
And your name without weeping I speak.
Ah, mother! we learn through time's weary years
What the poor heart may bear and not break.

To-day as I gazed on your picture,
In likeness so faithful and true,
Did you know how my poor heart was weeping,
And how it was calling for you?
Ah! that moment I know the dear angels
Missed you from your own holy place,
For I felt you were bending above me,
And leaving a kiss on my face.

And I heard in the hush of the moment
A sound like the sweep of a wing,
And a note trembled down through the silence
Like music, dear, you used to sing.
While the peace that is given the angels
Seemed wrapping me up in its fold,
Till the clouds of my sorrow were lifted
And their edges were bordered with gold.

When the fingers of twilight are closing
The dim, weary eyes of the day,
And the meek, lowly heads of the flowers
Are bowed in the silence to pray,
Oh! come, then, dear mother, and banish
The dust and the darkness of care,
And tell me a story of heaven,
And tell me you're loving me there.

And now that I've reached the "still river,"
Will you come to me—close by my side?
And lying so helpless with garments
All dusty and worn by the strife,
I am longing to bathe in the river,
In the waves of the River of Life.

And then can I kiss you in heaven,
And tell you how lonely I've been?
And find you the same, with your true, loving heart
Wide open to gather me in?
Alas! I am sometimes impatient,
And I feel but the blow of the rod!
Oh help me and strengthen me, mother,
Till we meet in the "mansions of God!"

D. W. B.—Q.—I shall be pleased to see your explanation, in The Progressive Thinker, of the following phenomena, which have been a part of my experience in life for many years, in fact all my life, and I am past 70.

At the period or interval between consciousness and unconsciousness, in lapsing into natural sleep, or retiring at night, certain peculiar visions come into my consciousness which are not dreams or like the ordinary dreams of full slumber. These visions take varied, and to me, unexplainable characteristics. Sometimes it is a landscape, but more often the vision takes the form of children at play, faces of men and women, all of whom seem to be entirely unconscious of my presence. A very few of these faces I have recognized, and the landscapes sometimes have familiar details in part. One striking vision was an open plain or prairie with hundreds of cattle grazing and standing in groups, all of the same color—red cattle throughout. Recently the form and face of a friend appeared, which I fully recognized—a person I was well acquainted with forty years ago, who died over thirty years ago. The face and form were quite distinct and easily recognized from memory. These visions or scenes come to me only in or before my first sleep, none appear after waking moments during the night. The second and following drowses never bring them. I shall be glad to read your explanation.

A.—The succession of scenes, etc., coming like an endless panorama before the mortal vision, is not rare. They come before sleep has rested the brain; when it is yet active with the work of the day. The subjective becomes so vivid that it seems real, or objective. This mental state is especially dominant in childhood, and when sent to their beds in darkened rooms, the strange forms which appear before them are mistaken for real. They cry out in fright, and too often instead of receiving sympathy and assurance, are severely reprimanded. Nothing is more cruel or detrimental to the child.

It must be accepted that impressions from spiritual sources often are so strong that they become realistic. Consequently, like all other psychic manifestations there is a blending and it is difficult to draw a sharp line of distinction between the activity of the self and the superior to self.

A mind in a passive state may receive trains of thought, and successions of pictures, as recipient to another impressing mind. It may by its own activity, conjure similar representations. The character of such impressions is the most available means of deciding their origin. If entirely outside the recipient's knowledge, the presumption is in favor an independent source.

B. M. H.—Q.—If a conductor has assumed entire control of a Lyceum, has he or she not absolute control of selecting leaders or teachers? Can the president of the society overrule the conductor?

A.—All officers, the leaders or teachers, are elected by ballot at an annual session held for that purpose. (See Lyceum Guide, page 154.)

When there is a temporary vacancy, on account of the absence of a leader, then it is the duty of the Guardian as superintendent of the groups to have such vacancies filled.

If your Lyceum is organized on the plan furnished by the Lyceum Guide, it is not the duty of the conductor to temporarily appoint teachers. This falls to the Guardian. The president of the society has absolutely no authority over the Lyceum.

If officers would closely study the constitution as given in the Guide, there would not arise this friction and contention over the functions of the offices, as the duty of each officer is plainly stated.

Wm. B. O'Neil:—Q.—Where can I obtain a work on telepathy, one treating the subject exhaustively?

A.—There has been no work published distinctively on this subject. The published proceedings of the Psychical Research Society contain many fact and experiments, but these are difficult to obtain.

D. P. Daniel:—Q.—How can a person be in two places at the same time, and these places thousands of miles apart?

A.—It is not possible for a person to be in two places at the same time. The phenomena alluded to in this question, is that of "double presence," which has perplexed investigators, but with the acceptance of the theory of thought-transference by means of waves in the psychic ether and reception of these waves by sensitiveness of the recipient, becomes in unison with other spiritual manifestations and readily explainable.

It is possible for the independent clairvoyant, in spirit, to visit distant localities and persons, and if the latter are sufficiently sensitive, they will recognize the clairvoyant's presence, precisely as they would that of a spirit.

Thought may be so vividly projected as to be received by the recipient, as objective, and thus transformed into a real object for the time. The spirit nor physical body can be in two places at the same time.

ARCANA OF SPIRITUALISM.

For some time I have been unable to fill orders for the ARCANA OF SPIRITUALISM, as the edition was all sold. I have now received from the binders the fifth edition, and am able to fill the orders of the friends who have kindly waited the delayed publication. I am obliged to them all for their patience as well as orders. I can now supply the book by return mail, at the same price, $1.25, with 10 cents added for postage.

I am not able yet to say when the ARCANA OF NATURE will be ready probably during the coming summer. A great many will be able to read this book at the libraries without purchasing, as the generous interest of a gentleman in New York will place 2,000 copies with these institutions. It is to be published simultaneously in London and New York. The Spiritual public will be supplied by the writer with a special edition. I am not able to state the price, but it will be made as low as cost will admit. Those who desire the book will confer a favor by sending me their addresses—not the price—and they will then receive the book immediately after it is ready, and I will at least discount the postage.

THE ARCANA OF NATURE was one of the first purely Spiritual books published—almost 50 years ago—and the demand for its republication evidences its intrinsic value. Its scientific statements are yet new and fresh, and just being reached by the scientists.

COMMON SENSE RELIGION.

I do not know from whence I came,
But find myself to-day
An old man, floating down the stream
Of life and destiny.

I am cognizant of the fact,
Evil and good exist;
I have the power to choose the good,
Evil I can resist.

Virtue and truth go hand in hand,
And elevate the soul;
Pleading a bleeding sacrifice
Leaves evil in control.

An angry God does not exist,
Such teaching is absurd;
Man is responsible if sane
For every act and word.

This preaching "Jesus paid it all"
Has filled the world with crime;
The biggest rogues on earth to-day
Will plead this every time.

But there is light that don't deceive,
And none need go astray;
The soul that seeks is sure to find
The truer and better way.

Break off sinning, love righteousness,
Do as you'd be done by;
Profession don't cut any ice,
But it does help to pray.

EDUCATE FOR THE WORK

Let Us Raise the Standard of Our Rostrum Work.

Spiritualism has had much to contend with in its growth from its inception, and nothing has held it back from that degree of progress that is its due as a truth, and as a thing everyone had previously sought—the knowledge of a future—more than the lack of educational inspiration.

Had it been born in the Methodist Church all other denominations would have been green with envy and jealousy, and no doubt it would have been fought more energetically than it was.

It came through the doorway of innocent childhood, and even though the trend of blind faith was in the direction of immorality, Christianity decried it and called it the work of the Devil. In the Church it would have been the work of God. So they fought this silent message that was to prove their own assertion of immortality, the thing they professed to believe, and sought to prove by a record of the dead past. They would not accept a live proof, for fear its truth might tear down its rickety structure and sweep the earth of its ignorance and superstition. Their fear has proven a prophecy, and that truth goes serenely marching on.

But the angel world is a natural world and from that sphere of justice and impartiality, from that realm of intelligence and silent power, manifestations are coming to the Atheist, to the Agnostic, to the Catholic and the Protestant; yea, to the thoughtless girl and boy to prove this truth without regard to organizations of any sort.

Therefore, as these phenomena are not our own, and as we cannot in our human greed corner them, we must continue to accept the advice of those higher intelligences and endeavor to make conditions better and more inviting for those teachers who would aid us by giving them clean, moral, truthful and intellectual channels through which to expound their sacred knowledge, their beautiful code of ethics, their divine truth of eternal progress and unfoldment.

It need not be told as a matter of news that at last Spiritualism—organized Spiritualism has established an institution of learning where thinking, aspiring minds can be guided, through channels of instruction, into the intellectual, the psychical, the historical and the oratorical work that are so much needed at the present stage of Spiritualism's progress, and as the old wheel horses retire to their spirit homes, will be still more greatly needed.

In fact, children and adult Spiritualists can now be fitted directly into the field work at the Morris Pratt Institute, at Whitewater, Wis.

Now, with this preface, the writer has a double proposition to make to the Spiritualists of Illinois, viz:

1. If there is a young lady or gentleman, with a fairly good education, who truly aspires to the work of a speaker, here in this State, and who has some means accumulated or awaiting him or her for that purpose, and will write to Mrs. A. J. Weaver of Whitewater, assistant secretary of the Morris Pratt Institute, or to Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, secretary, of this City, a way can be found clear, at a light expense, to take a through course, and information will be furnished relative thereto.

2. If every Spiritualist in the State will send a small sum to the educational fund of the treasury of the Illinois State Spiritualists' Association, (through its Secretary, Miss Eugenia Roubie, 4567 E. 62nd st, Chicago), say from $1 to $5 or more, if it can be spared, some aspiring persons, too poor to take the course, can be sent each year.

A collection of $70 was taken up at the 1907 convention to go towards paying a student's tuition, and remains in that special fund still, and would be applied to that purpose, if the right aspirant comes forward for the next term of school, from this state.

Now let us swell this fund by donations. I am authorized to state that the Secretary of the State Association will start the movement with a $5.00 donation, and the writer hereof will agree to pay the same amount annually. Who will send a like or greater amount?

This is a move that will never be regretted. Write to Whitewater for explanatory literature, and begin at once to do something for a higher Spiritualism. Give an occasional public circle, dear medium, and let us advance the educational, the moral, the religious, the spiritual side along with the phenomenal. Now don't wait to count your money. As soon as you read this, go and get a draft, postal note or express money order, and begin to ease your conscience and lift some poor, aspiring boy or girl to that beautiful altitude of a competent worker in the Cause you love.

A pull altogether will do this with such ease that no one will feel the strain, and no one feel the poorer at the end of the year.

This plea is not from the president of the State Association in an official capacity, but from a Spiritualist who has been in the watchtower of the Cause for years taking observations of the victories gained and the failures met with, and can truly sense the present need of an uplift in the direction of more light; more education; more moral courage, and a higher regard for the sacred side of the Spiritualistic movement. Let us now begin to act in this direction and save to our Cause all that is high and holy in the knowledge of spirit return.

Send in your donations; organize for that special purpose, and get a hustle the like of which has never been known, and give Spiritualism a push to the front.

"AUTO DA FE."

At Lisbon, Nov. 1, 1755.—An Incident of the Great Earthquake.

The sun o'er the Sierras crept,
And dazzled their white peaks, that slept
Forever in the sky.
The wakened Tagus blinked and gleamed,
And danced, as now the sunlight streamed
Upon its waters, that had dreamed
Within the shadows nigh.

The massive, frowning temples wear
A weirdy gaunt and hostile air
To the clairvoyant view;
And o'en the awkward hovels strain
Awry, and stare; a wretched train!
Adown the street and back again,
Like some o'er-drunken crew.

The city's thronging populace,
That fills its streets with eager pace,
(With looks expectant on each face),
Swells to'rd the frowning wall
Of the old prison, dark and drear,
That limns its gloomy shadows near;
Where dungeoned hopes have died, and fear
And horror spread their pall.

Hark, the bells' the signal's given,
And back the massive bolts are driven;—
The doors are opened wide.
Out pours the guard, with pike and spear!
The people, standing dumbly near,
Are rudely thrust aside.
Now come the priests, in nowing dress,
With cross, and chant, and righteousness,
And fierce and 'vengeful pride.

Behind the helpless captives came;
Their bodies doomed to death by flame;
Their tender feet unshod.
To priest they scorned to bend the knee;
Denied "INFALLIBILITY;"
And, 'spite of Romish Pope's decree,
According to their conscience, free,
They dared to worship God!

Old men, with whitened locks of hair,
And sturdy youths were marching there,
With virgin maidens, young and fair,
And mothers, bowed by weight of care,
All in the doom-ed throng!
A holy calm within each face,
One instant awes the populace,
That stares, while shrinking back apace,
To watch them move along.

One walks amid that Spartan band;
That sweetest maid in all the land!
With soft, expressive eyes.
Why goes SHE to the martyr's fire,
Where Hate hath lit the fun'ral pyre,
Whose flames shall blot the sky?
O, God! hast Thou no power to save
This maiden, tender—yet so brave!
Too beautiful to die?

An anxious glance around she throws
For some one whom her fond heart knows
Beyond all other men.
He promised her; he'd come and press
Her in his arms; in dast'ardness,
And share her awful wretchedness,
Beyond all human ken.

The "square" is gained; the victims bound
Among the fagots heaped around!
Why hast thy lover fled?
A priest, with crucifix in hand,
Before the maiden takes his stand;
His heart by slight compassion fanned—
Or is it lust instead?

"Repent thy sin 'gainst Church!" he cried;
Then moving closer to her side,
Bent down and whispered low:
"Retract, fair maiden, ere too late!
And I will save thee from thy fate,
And give thee weal for woe."
"No, no!" she cried; "thy Church of hate
Is but of Hell the outer gate,
Through which I ne'er shall go!"
"Then die!" he hissed with closing teeth;
Then motioned, and the fagots 'neath
The maiden were aglow.

But hark! A rumbling sound is heard!
The dull Earth moves, and trees are stirred!
Gaunt fear reigns over all!
A mighty wave o'erleaps the shore,
And quenches with an awful roar,
Those flames of wrath, that nevermore
Shall hosts of Heav'n appall.

Another shock—and crash on crash!
Huge buildings lie a shapeless mass
Of ruin all around!
The terror-stricken priests have fled;
The horde, by wild confusion led;
The maimed, the dying with the dead
Are trampled o'er the ground.

As if endowed with unseen wings,
A youth toward the maiden springs,
And parts the cruel rope.
"O, Carlos! thou hast come!" she cries;
Then, faint within his arms she lies;
Closed are her dark and lovely eyes,
As Carlos whispers "HOPE!"

Then, swifter than the Arab's steed,
Away, away his strong limbs speed
Toward the boundless Main,
To safely sail its waters o'er,
And reach old England's kinder shore,
To dwell in peace forevermore,
Beyond the harm of Spain.

EARTHLY LIFE ALL A DREAM, SAYS TOLSTOI.

Great Russian Says Death Is Merely the Awakening to Realities.—Welcomes Next Life.—Slumber Begins With Birth and in Hereafter Neighborly Love Is Not Theory.

(Special to the Post-Dispatch, St. Louis, Mo.)

Paris, France.—The Matin publishes a strange article from Tolstoi on the problem of the next world. The great Russian writes:

"I am waiting for quite another happiness; already it approaches.

"We live dreams with almost the same intensity as we do reality. Pascal, I believe, says that if we could see ourselves in dreams and were always in that condition we would consider dreams the reality, reality the dreams. That is not altogether exact, for reality is more true than dreams.

"All of our life from birth to death is fraught with dreams. Is it not also a dream which we take for reality? Are we not certain of its reality simply because we do not know another life, more real?

"Not only do I believe that, but I am convinced it is the sole reason of the certitude that earthly life is one of dreams and of another life more real and on to infinity, until we reach that last life which is the life of God.

"Birth and our first ideas on earth may be considered the beginning of slumber and all terrestrial life makes our total slumber. Death is the awakening of the sleeper. In the present dream there is an appearance of love of our neighbor, but in the life to which we are going, that love is not simply an aspiration but a reality.

"I do not amuse myself by imagining this theory. I believe with all my soul what I say. I feel and I know with certainty that in dying, I shall be happy, that then I shall enter a world more real."

TOLSTOI'S VIEW IS RIGHT, SAYS THEOSOPHIST LEADER.

Russian Savant's Theory on Life and Death Find Echo in Beliefs of Van Hook.

St. Waller Van Hook, general secretary of the American Theosophical Society, Chicago, has written for the Post-Dispatch his views on Count Tolstoi's utterances on life and death. In reply to a friend's congratulations on his birthday, Tolstoi wrote:

"Our earthly life is one of dreams of another and more real life, and that other life is a dream of yet another, and so on ad infinitum, even to the last life, the life of God.

"Death in youth, is as when a man is awakened before he has slept full measure. Death in old age, is as when a man wakes of his own accord after a good sleep. Suicide is as a nightmare which a man banishes by remembering that he is asleep. He makes an effort and awakes."

Dr. Van Hook writes:

"It is gratifying to learn that Count Tolstoi so clearly recognized the continuity of life, of consciousness beyond death, and that he sees the joy and glory of release from the bondage of the flesh. The soul of a true man leaving the physical body leaps triumphant into the broader, freer consciousness, life and action of the higher state.

Suicide is Shirking Duty.

"There is no hell but the hell of ignorance of the law of universal evolution and the discord of running counter to that law. The suicide is unfortunate to the last degree in his ignorance, for he enters the higher state of consciousness only to learn his error in trying to evade the just law which laid burdens of suffering on him in earth life in order that he might learn certain needed lessons. Awakening to the new form of consciousness he instantly sees his error and for long is filled with remorse that he has played the truant and lost his golden school day.

"The life beyond the grave is indeed more real than this—a long step toward absolute union with God's consciousness, which is the only permanent and perfect reality. To choose death by suicide is a sad shirking of duty. To die in youth or middle age is, indeed, to awaken the more glorious, fuller, more joyous life. To die in old age is, if anything, a great relief, since the worn old body has as a rule long ceased to act for its wearer as a suitable medium of expression and vehicle of action.

"Such a splendid being as Tolstoi will speedily enter into a high state of consciousness after death, communing with many of the mighty sages and philosophers who have gone before, and he will, long hence, return to another earth life, in a new body, provided with fuller counsels, richer wisdom and enlarged powers, to delight and teach and lead mankind more gloriously than he has in his life.

"Bon voyage, brave and great Tolstoi."

Transition of a Noble Man.

Thursday, April 23, 1908, Cyrenius W. Judd, of Tounville, Pa., graduated from this world of physical sense to the superior sphere beyond the "Great Divide." He was one of the noblest and best of men. A Spiritualist for fifty years, his life was a talisman and testimony for the cause. Born Sept. 6, 1826, he has given many years to the world, all of which added to the betterment of society. Married to Emily Lowe, July 4, 1858, they were contemplating a family reunion on the fiftieth anniversary of their marriage, next fourth of July. Mrs. Judd is a sister of Mrs. E. L. Watson, the ever popular inspirational orator of California; and the remarkable talent that characterizes the whole of the large family, is fully represented in Mrs. Emily Judd.

The Judds and Lowes are striking examples of superior moral character, intellectual acumen, and spiritual virtues. A large attendance at the funeral—conducted by the writer—Sunday, April 26, attested the loving esteem in which the family is held by the general public. The gospel of Spiritualism comforts his beloved companion; but the change covers her earth life with a heavy shadow of pain. The Grange, of which he was an honored member, conducted the service at the grave. All who knew him bless his memory. To me he was a brother much loved.

THE AGE OF REASON.

Psychic Science Claims That the Gradual Effect of Liberal and Scientific Thought Upon the Human Brain is the Formation and Growth of New Brain Cells That Soon Become Susceptible to the Influx of Kindred Thought.

To the Editor: The present age history will bear out the statement that man is rapidly advancing in the scale of spiritual growth; he is growbetter and wiser. This country is being swept by a wave of righteousness that will bear fruit and lead to the nation's spiritual advancement. Temperance in all things is the slogan of the present-day reformer. What does it all mean? What is the cause of this general awakening of the nation's conscience? Is it the effect of religious teachings of the old school, or must we attribute this phenomenal assertion of man's higher being to the teachings of advanced and liberal thought in science and religion?

The almost universal and spontaneous quickening of man's higher faculties seem to indicate that modern scientific research and new thought teachings that appeal strongly to individualism are to be the agents of a great reformatory movement that may eclipse in its far-reaching effects any human agency for man's spiritual and intellectual advancement ever undertaken in the world's history.

Psychic science claims that the gradual effect of liberal and scientific thought upon the human brain is the formation and growth of new brain cells that soon become susceptible to the influx of kindred thought. The soul of man—the ego—is the builder and master of its body; it shapes and molds its atomic structure unconsciously in accordance with its thought. The time is at hand when man will become conscious of this mighty power that is akin to the Infinite. The proper and legitimate use of it, will give him perfect mastery of himself and his body.

The tremendous effect of such a transformation upon the spiritual and physical development of the race can hardly be estimated at this time; it would surpass the fondest hopes of those who are now laboring for the uplifting of humanity. Mankind is living in a realm of thought of illimitable expanse, governed by the law of vibration, attraction and repulsion. There are no barriers between this world and the spiritual world. The current of thought waves is electrical in nature; it is a force and unlimited as to distance. The law of thought transference and telepathy has been abundantly demonstrated and it seems logical and in accordance with natural law that its operation should extend to the unseen realm—the spiritual world. We are constantly dwelling in a maze of thought waves that embraces the seen and unseen worlds. One may form his own conclusions as to the effect of intelligently directed thought waves from the spirit realm upon the human brain in this world. The possibilities are immense; they are not speculations of an imaginary mind, nor are they vagaries of a disordered brain. They are living problems that confront mankind.

The mere reference to an intimate relationship of the two worlds, based upon the indisputable law of vibratory action of thought force and its resultant effect upon sensitive human brains opens up a mental vista that may well amaze the most skeptical student of modern science. The persistent efforts of psychic research will finally establish a union of science and religion upon the altar of reason, the pinnacle of faith in that infinite wisdom that governs human life from its first entrance into earth-life conditions, its trying experiences along life's narrow pathway and its final passing into spirit life—an unbroken chain of continuous, progressive growth. It is only reasonable to suppose that God, in his infinite love and wisdom, has made it possible for man to continue his progressive growth in spirit life, unhampered by material limitations. In this age of reason human minds are led more readily by appeals to their intelligence than by adherence to all time dogmas and doctrines that have outlived their age of human origin. God's laws never change, and if man follows them as his guide it will safely bring him that peace "that passeth all understanding."

HENRY SCHARFFETTER.

Baltimore, Md.

Transition of Geo. H. Brooks' Mother.

At the home of my sister, Mrs. F. A. Sherman, at Oak Park, Ill, my dear mother passed to spirit life aged 89 years, 6 months and 3 days. For fifty-four years my dear mother has been separated from her companion, and what a glorious reception it must have been when at last they met, as well as her two sons and one daughter who passed away many years ago. Mother passed away most beautifully; you could not tell when the soul left the body, and after her going there was the most beautiful, peaceful influence that filled the entire home and rested upon us all, as a divine benediction, and it remained long after the home was once more quiet. I went to help care for mother, as soon as I could, went Monday, the 27th, and was in hopes mother would recognize me, but she never did.

I know it is best she is released from earth, to go on and be with father and the many dear ones there, yet I find her going has been most hard to bear. She was a true, noble mother, and she filled her mission in the highest and truest sense. There are left behind one daughter, two sons and one sister. Mother was a pronounced Universalist, coming from a stock that were among the very first to advocate Universalism. The funeral was held Sunday the 3rd, at my sister's and my sister took the remains back to Munnsville, Madison Co., N. Y., where her form was buried.

Mother has gone. God bless her, she is free to dwell in a land free from the sorrows of earth. The soul life is made richer by her going. Earth was blessed by as true and devoted a mother as ever came to earth.

MAHOMET'S MESSAGE.

A Spirit Message From Mahomet, Given Through the Mediumship of Libbie Ziegler, Denver, Col.

Ancient voices are being heard from the spirit side of life in your day and age, warning the children of your plane of life to be up and doing the work that has been given to them to accomplish. There should be high progression on your side of life, just the same as on our side. If more of the children of your plane would seek to blot out the sufferings of the children who carry on the work, how much easier would be the progression of all. Look at the improvements of the age in which you live, and then look at those of my time, on your plane; then would it not be easier for you to take up the yoke of the spirit and aid your fellow man into the high and supreme thought that would lead you unto a most perfect day?

There will be many powers that will rule your planes, but the supreme and all-wise power that should rule, is the great power of spiritual truth, and the time draws nigh when your earth will be one of love and life, one in which the spirit will rule and will make all men equal in thought, soul and power.

The spirit on the spirit plane does his or her duty with a love of doing that which is right, not for the praise it gets, but for the aid and advancement it can give others. Be warned of aiding others to receive reward, for the God of Spirits is the rewarder of all men and giver of all perfect gifts.

The spirit realm from which I come is a land of perfection, knowing no rule except love and the great power of spirit progression. The God's principle and love are one, and the gates to our spheres are faith, trust and obedience. LIGHT is furnished by the auras of our spirits which make our city a place of radiance, equaled by naught but the brightest sun-rays. Our simple love of aiding others on your side of life, as well as of those who know not how to progress their souls from the dark spheres, animates us and fills us with joy in progressing humanity.

How fleeting are the shadows of your plane with its everyday toil, compared to the great peace and rest that are awaiting the faithful ones who do their work with patience and meekness, having no thought of reward, for the less you think of self, the greater numbers can be saved to bless you and make your earth burdens lighter, for by thinking, speaking and acting as if you were working hand in hand with God, do you find the work easier and life more progressive.

Many question the power of spirit, but those who question us on your side, and believe us not, will see the time when they are spirits and be questioned in like manner by the earth children. Believe you in the Cosmic principle of God in His all-wise and infinite power, and then you will cease to doubt that He sends His messengers to you. Would He in any light strain, send you deceptive messages? Would a ruler, high in authority on your planes, who had no good reason whatever, try to deceive His children? If the children of your earth, who receive spirit messages, and who become impatient because they do not see results come the minute they are desired, will seek by prayer to make yourselves fit companions for the spirit, you will always find that the messages will come to you according to your spirit unfoldment. Sometimes they miss the exact time fulfillment, but you soon see that the spirit is Truth forever in the realm of spirit.

On a previous occasion Mahomet gave us the following, which he desires to be added:

I am going to give you just a short address to simplify things to your minds and show you the beginning of God's great work! God, the Infinite Father, knows and loves us all. He reaches out His right hand, not only to one but to all. The poorest of His children, as men count possessions, are the richest in His sight in the kingdom of heaven. Those of you who sow and work and seem not to reap, do reap in spirit, wonderful results. The homes of the spirits are not governed by rulers, but by God, the Father. You govern your own spirit home by your thoughts and the conditions which you form around yourself. The spirit of God worketh wonders and worketh in mystery; it bringeth forth many things, and as you sow, so shall you reap, saith the Lord of Hosts. Watch ye well, speak kindly to one another, think ye first of the kingdom of God, and all things will be unto you perfect.

The perfection of God is the perfection of spirit. Find ye the holy spirit within yourself, and God, the loving Father, bringeth those you love before you, not as they were, but as they are in spirit, faithful even unto death. The Reaper, the king of hosts, sends forth his messengers and calls this one and that one home, because the spirit seeks to cling to the body. Decay being there, God sees fit to release the spirit and bring it home to progress therein to the glory of His most high name.

(Mahomet, through the hand of Libbie Ziegler, Denver, Col.)

THE RELIGIOUS QUESTION.

This Writer Insists Spiritualism Is Not a Religion.

What religion really is continues to be discussed in your columns from various standpoints, and the most far-fetched ideas are connected with it in an effort to show it is something good, and everybody must have it to be normal in their makeup and happy in living.

Such ideas find no stopping-place in my mind, and no more desire exists for religion in any form than for brain-bondage and thought-restrictions by some other means of producing such results. I want freedom to think naturally but when a man connects himself with any kind of religion as defined by the dictionaries, and there is where we must go for the meaning of words if we are to understand each other and talk rationally,—he puts restrictions on his "thinker" and becomes more or less the slave of fear. As all religions, which the world recognizes as religions and speaks of as such, have a God on which to rest, we find religious people trying to discover what this god wants them to do, and what kind of worship is the most pleasing to him.

Religion connects men with some kind of a God, and is ever trying to define what those relations are; but as gods are nothing but creations of the imagination, religious duties when summed up correctly are simply what priestcraft—which outlines them for the masses, thinks and says they are.

Cut out the Gods, and you can dispense with real religion as readily as a man going from Chicago to the equator could there discard his overcoat.

The world would never have been cursed with Gods trying to control men's thoughts and actions or any kind of religion, had the human intellect always been where we see it to-day in the highest form in men of great scientific attainments. Those things and ideas owe their origin to the infancy of the race when mental faculties were undeveloped, and to cherish and perpetuate them now is to reveal a desire to look backward instead of forward; to be the slave of other men's ideas when they knew nothing comparatively with what is known to-day, and may yet be learned if faces are kept toward the rising sun.

It is one thing to call Spiritualism a religion, and another to prove it. A pretty good proof that it is a religion will be forthcoming when its buildings, devoted to Sunday services are exempt from taxation in those states that so favor real religious organizations. No state nor our national government, looks upon Spiritualism as being a religion; and the only claim that it is comes from the reactionary portion of Spiritualists who are so much in love with the word they cannot bear to discard it.

Spiritualism is no more a religion as defined by standard dictionaries which regulate the use of words, than is the platform of the democratic party, for it has no more to do with Gods, upon which all religions rest.

Spiritualism claims to connect the spirits of the dead mortals with live ones, and to demonstrate that death is not the end of human consciousness. Its mission is to establish the fact if possible, and to reveal the folly of accepting religious beliefs that fill the mind with fear and terror. Its work was along those lines when it burst upon the world 60 years ago, and it did more to dissipate the horrors of the Christian religion than any movement that has set thought in motion since that senseless superstition had birth nearly 2000 years ago. And to the pioneers in the movement who tried to dissipate the doctrine of hell fire and damnation so generally accepted and believed in 1848, and to rescue the human mind from the thraldom of priestcraft—another name for religion—I doff my hat with respect and approval, but for those who are now trying to make of Spiritualism a religion, and to connect it with an infinite God which finite minds cannot comprehend, if such a god could possibly exist, I have nothing but censure and contempt, for it is a backward step that will affect humanity in its efforts to progress, and get rid of all religions, which have no excuse for being now the gods are dead.

Fake Medium Has Easy Graft in a Seance With the Gullible.—Discovers a Lost Art in the Treatment of Minerals With Chemicals.—Locates "Color," But It Has Stamp of Government Upon Its Face. Not Found on Desert Wastes But in the Pockets of His Dupes.—Spirit Return Mixed With Deception.

To the Editor: The enclosed article from The Sun of San Bernardino, Cal., of May 3, explains itself. Tabor, who is a "delicate looking little chap," weighing about 125 pounds, awakened sympathy by his appearance, and by the fact that he would not accept any money at seances where no results were forthcoming, and they were quite numerous. However, he was given a "test" by members of the local socieety here, and after waiting for an hour without any demonstrations whatever, things began to happen during the second hour. The trumpet was moved and tapped several people upon the hands; the guitar moved and was played upon. Tabor sat at one end of a long narrow table, and the guitar was at the extreme other end. Reliable persons had hold of Tabor's two hands. No person could have been concealed in the room, and the two doors were locked. One door opened into the public hallway of the hotel and the other into an adjoining room, but this second door was also fastened with a screw driven into the crack between the door and the jam.

So you see how he won our confidence and pretending to be sickly diverted attention from his real purpose.

Tabor is about 5 feet, 8 inches high, has dark hair, which he parts in the middle, brown eyes, a sallow complexion and clean shaven face. His wife is short, and weighs about 160 pounds. Tabor drinks nearly a quart of whiskey every day, and smokes innumerable cigarettes. His chief guide is a negress, and he speaks with a Southern accent.

His case is now up before the prosecuting attorney of this city.

SECRETARY.

San Bernardino, Cal.

W. R. Taber, where art thou?

More than one good Spiritualist of this section is asking the question, impelled by the knowledge that Taber is about the smoothest article in his line who has come this way in many a long year. Few Spiritualists escaped his control, and all who placed faith in him are to-day minus considerable of their good money. In fact the statement is made that the wily rascal got away with many hundreds of dollars.

Located Case.

Taber's supreme graft was to pretend to locate a deposit of wondrous metal, having the appearance of copper, only blazing bright like the sun, light as aluminum, hard as steel, and would not tarnish. "It's the lost art that I have found," exclaimed Taber to his credulous dupes, and they poured out their money like water at his behest.

Taber came to this locality, presumably from Los Angeles, two months ago. He took apartments at the Westminster, and a few days later his wife joined him. He hung out a card as a medium, and took membership with the local Spiritualist society. At first he posed as a developing medium. One victim states that he had the power of dematerializing, and offered to develop her along such lines, and only take pay when she was satisfied with the results. She bit, and paid him $50 for chemicals necessary in the development.

"He would come to the house about once a week," stated the subject. "We pulled down the shades, lighted a ruby lantern, and he would swing a censer burning the chemicals. The aroma was stifling, but so sweet. All the spices of the famed Isle of Spice could not be more so.

"He had a yellow streak or I would have become possessed of full dematerializing powers. I am convinced of this by what little experience I had. Please don't mention my name, for the world laughs at such things. But he was crooked, his own power was stunted, and money, money, was all he could think about, talk about or see. After you placed yourself in his keeping he squeezed you for every dollar you could get."

Strong on Mines.

Many local Spiritualists were taken in by this game, and becoming established Taber then branched out as the discoverer of a wondrous mine. D. R. Davis, of 666 Sixth street, was one of the first he approached on this subject. To him Taber described the nature of the metal, told of somewhere in the Scriptures, and seemed greatly excited when he made his first discovery. This was first made in Cajon Pass, about forty miles from a ranch house. The "precious" mineral was formally located in Davis' name, but Taber abandoned it, claiming the ledge was too public. He therefore took up another location on a ridge of the hills north of town, between C and D streets.

Taber grew more and more enthusiastic. He claimed to have reduced the ores by a mysterious process, known to him through his power of divination, and finally informed his victim that there were fortunes in it for all. Pitifully easy were the Spiritualists to stumble into the trap, and swallow the bait he had so skillfully spread before them. His declaration was that he had secured a wealthy capitalist to put money in the mine.

Syndicate to Buy Mine.

Finally a syndicate was to buy the property, and about Wednesday, April 13, Taber showed what he declared was a telegram which he had received from Los Angeles. It was signed merely "H. L." and asked him to hold onto the property, as the capitalists would come across by April 20. So that was the date set for the closing of the deal. This "telegram" was written with a typewriter on a Western Union blank, but it was the "sending" instead of "receiving" blank, though this was not noticed by those to whom the "message" was shown.

According to Taber's declaration the capitalists represented by "H. L." were to deposit the sum of $10,000 cash on April 20, to bind the deal. This money was to be distributed among those who had been taken into the deal, including Davis, the other payments were to follow, until the total of $250,000 had been paid, when title would pass to the purchasers, but Davis, Taber and others would then be on velvet.

Davis, who is one of the most faithful believers in Spiritualism in this city, dug up to the tune of $150. A widow residing at Highland handed over $200; and numerous other men and women contributed sums ranging over $50 to $100, and one old lady, who has been a Spiritualist almost all her life, was about to mortgage her home and turn over $1,000, but she fell ill the day before the mortgage was to be executed, and took this as an omen that she had sufficient of this world's goods, and so religiously turned against the scheme.

Confidence Inspired.

Taber explained that the man who sent the alleged telegram was Howard Longley, son of a wealthy and prominent family of Washington, D. C. The telegram inspired confidence, but, when, two days later, the wife of Taber took her departure from town, the victims commenced to have an awakening suspicion that all was not as it should be. Two days after that, at 10 o'clock at night, Taber telephoned to Davis, telling him that he was going to the train in hope of meeting a man, but if he failed to be there that Taber would have to take a run out on the desert, about 18 miles north of Barstow.

This increased suspicion. Taber had taken Davis to his room at the Westminster and requested him to remain there until he returned from the desert. And Davis waited, suspicious, yet willing to give the man a chance to make good. That proved a long week. "Say, did the boys ever take you snipe hunting," exclaimed Davis last night, with a merry twinkle in his keen blue eyes. "Well, that's about what Taber did to me—kept me a whole week holding the sack for the 'snipe,' only worse. He's the smoothest article I have ever met. He's a well informed chemist, drinks like a fish and is an inveterate cigarette smoker."

It is the belief of the local Spiritualists that he has gone to San Diego. They are of the opinion that he has worked his graft extensively, and have information that he swindled numerous people on the same graft at Los Angeles.

Still Have Faith.

But the most remarkable feature of the story is the fact that the people who were duped by Taber still have confidence in his theories, even though they are compelled to admit that he himself is a fakir. In investigating the story yesterday, Sun men were told that there was no doubt that Taber had the secret of dematerialization, and one of those who was swindled out of $150 still points to the fact that he yet has some of the chemicals that will accomplish this impossible result.

Taber also professed to have the power of prophecy, although whether it extends further than for him to be able to say when he had better seek new pastures, does not appear. By means of his dematerialization chemicals, he also professed to be able to transmit the gift of foretelling to others. Of course this was after he knew the amount of their contribution.

The Magnet and Thought Waves Considered.

To the Editor: The question is often asked, why cannot any one become a medium? To any one acquainted with the forces required and the laws by which those forces are governed, the answer is easy to explain. To illustrate in a homely way: If I throw a lot of steel dust to the wind, it will probably pass by lots of things without touching them; but if, by chance there should be a magnet in the path of this dust it would attract all that came within its power, and the quantity so attracted would depend upon the quantity and the power of the forces used. There would be an affinity between the dust and the magnet which would cause them to unite.

Now, I understand that thought goes out in waves; those waves might pass by thousands without touching them, so to speak, because they have not the attractive power necessary; but when they come in contact with one possessing that power (like the magnet), they are attracted at once, and the power developed in the receptive would depend upon the power of the thought waves and of the receptive to receive.

Spirit Locates Asphalt Beds

Another Chapter From the Experiences of Prof. E. J. Hoyt, of Arkansas City, Kansas.

In the year 1895 I set out to explore for asphalt in the regions of northern Texas. One night, after a day of hard tramping, weary search, I put up at a hotel in Gainesville, Texas, and after retiring to my room for the night, all at once my attention was attracted to sounds, which I heard on a stand close by, and having had experience with the Spiritual phenomena, I at once concluded that these sounds or raps were intended to draw my attention, and I at once put myself in touch with the controlling Intelligence. A communication between myself and the Intelligence was at once opened and carried on by means of verbal question and answers by raps. I asked of the Intelligence if it had any information to give me that would aid me in my undertaking. He answered, "Yes," by means of raps. I asked, "Do you know what I am in search of?" Answer, "Yes." my next question was, "Who are you?" To be brief he told me he was a Comanche Indian and that he knew me in 1872 during the government survey of the Indian Territory. He also said that he was with me in the Wild West Department in Philadelphia in 1888, all of which was true.

I asked him if he knew where there were any tar deposits or what is now known as asphalt. He said he did. I asked where it was and after many questions and answers, he told me it was about forty miles south and east of Fort Sill. I recognized it would be in the neighborhood of Ardmore, and he told to me to go Ardmore and that when I got there, he would come to me there and give me further instructions relative to the asphalt deposit.

I then asked him if there were anything further that he would like to tell me. He said, "Yes." I asked him if what he had to tell me was of great importance. He said, "Yes." About this time a great shower, as it were, of raps, came from every quarter of the room. After many questions relative to what those raps were made for, he told me that they were a warning to me and told me that the hotel I was then in would get afire in the morning, which it did, and that fire caused me to make a sudden and very hasty move in the morning.

The next morning I took the first train for Ardmore. That night in Ardmore I opened communication with what purported to be the spirit of my Indian friend and he at once told me to go sixteen miles northwest, which I did, and by noon reaching a little town called Woodford. This was the locality designated by the spirit, and I at once set out to explore that locality. And in less than two hours I was standing on the mother asphalt lode of that country.

I proceeded at once to secure title from the Indians to said deposit, which I did, and went into camp.

I once more put myself in touch with my spirit friend and he appeared to be very much elated over the progress so far made. He then and there told me that there were other spirits who wanted to speak to me on another subject. The communicating Intelligence changed and told me to secure a pair of double slates and that they would write me on the inside of those slates. I secured the slates and after a few attempts on their part, they informed me that they were ready to proceed.

After carefully cleaning the slates, I placed them on the stands, and with their permission, I placed my head on those slates. And at once I heard writing on the inside of those slates, and almost as soon begun I heard three raps, which indicated that they were done. I asked if I should open the slates and they said, "Yes." And to my great surprise, I found the bottom slate filled with good, plain writing. This writing was made by my brother, who died thirty years previous to that time. You want to know how I knew that the writing came from my brother. I will say that he addressed me by a given name by which I was not known outside of the family. I can also say that his manner of expression and the form and shape of the letters which he made, and closing remarks and by signing his name in full, is sufficient evidence to me that the person who wrote on the slate was my brother.

About this time and at the same place occurred another wonderful experience in the way of proving Spiritualism to be a reality. As I said before, I was in camp about sixteen miles from Ardmore and had written to my wife, who at that time was living in Arkansas City, Kansas, about two hundred miles north of where I then was, requested that she send me two sixty-pound cans of strained honey, from my own apiary. She did so and I received the bill of lading. After due time had elapsed, I inquired at the depot in Ardmore for the honey, but I was told that no honey had come. I kept going to the depot almost daily to see if my honey had arrived, but they kept telling me that no honey had come. I, having a sweet tooth, became anxious about my honey, so I thought I would see if my spirit friend could not help me to discover the whereabout of my two cans of honey. Accordingly, I asked them if they could not find and tell me where the honey was, and they said they would try. That was all that was said in reference to it that night. The next night I asked them if they had found my honey and they said they had, and to my great surprise informed me that it was in the freight depot at Ardmore, and had been there for a week, notwithstanding the fact that I had been inquiring for it almost every day during that week.

I asked them where in the depot it was. They told me it was in the southwest corner of the depot, one can set on top of the other, and was under and obscured by an immense pile of furniture.

Fortified with this information I again went to the depot and demanded my honey. The agent again told me that it was not there, but I, relying upon the information I got from my invisible friends, told it was there. I also told him that it was under a huge pile of furniture in the southwest corner of the freight depot.

The agent said he was satisfied that the honey was not under the furniture and showed a strong reluctance to moving it as it required a great deal of labor to do so.

When I saw that he hesitated to move the furniture on account of the expense, I made him an offer. I told him if he would set men to work to remove the furniture and it proved that the honey was not there, I would pay the cost of removing it.

In brief, we found the honey under the pile of furniture and one can placed over the other, exactly as my invisible friends told me.

The discovery of the honey in the manner above mentioned caused no small wonder in the mind of the agent, and after urgent request, I told him from whom I got my information as to where the honey was. To say the agent was astonished, would be putting it mildly.

This is but an item of the many experiences of a kindred nature that I have had.

LINES TO BABY LUCERNE.

(Dedicated to Lucerne Zinzow, of Milwaukee, Wis.)

Oh, I know a precious baby who has come to bless a home,
Who has entered in the mortal, neath Love's highly tow'ring dome;
Who has laid the plans of future for his parents in their yearn;
And this darling angel baby wears the pretty name Lucerne.

Pretty baby; angel baby, out of soul-land having come
To the hungry, loving parents, as a sweet and wholesome crumb,
Come with welcome, come enchanting hearts with links of purest gold,
For a life of high unfoldment here within the mortal mold.

Out of Life's great depth of silence, up from other forms of clay;
Up from other souls immortal thy pure soul has found its way;
And as baby eyes outsearching find the beauties here in store,
May these beauties bloom and fashion thee in soul forevermore.

DR. T. WILKINS.

A VERY CURIOUS CASE.

One That Will Excite Great Attention Among Spiritualists.—As Set Forth in the Washington (D. C.) Times a Medium Sues Mrs. Adams' Widow, Wanting a Fee for Influencing Him in Making Will.

New York.—Mrs. Al. Adams, widow of the former "policy king," has admitted through her counsel that she had been sued by a Spiritualist medium and teacher of psychology for five per cent of the fortune of $2,000,000 left by Adams. Attorneys for Mrs. Adams have been asked to accept service of the summons, which is dated April 29.

The suit is based upon a claim that Mrs. Adams signed an agreement to pay five per cent of all received by her to the medium if he would get Mr. Adams to make a will in Mrs. Adams' favor.

Thomas J. Betiero, the medium and complainant in the case, says that as soon as the matter reaches court a most sensational story will be made public.

According to the story told by the medium, Mrs. Adams was living apart from her husband for several months just prior to his death. When it became known that he was dying it is claimed that Mrs. Adams went to Betiero and asked him if he could do anything to influence her husband to make a will in her favor.

Lessons in Psychology.

At the same time Mrs. Adams is said to have expressed a great interest in Spiritualism and psychology. As a result of these lessons she is said to have been assured in advance that Mr. Adams would leave the bulk of his fortune to her.

Betiero asserts that he went to Mr. Adams while the policy man was ill at the Ansonia and persuaded him to become reconciled to his wife, and leave his fortune to her. A reconciliation is claimed to have been effected just before Adams committed suicide.

Mrs. Adams' beautiful daughters are said to be particularly insistent that their mother shall fight the claim of the Spiritualist. Mrs. Adams herself is living at 417 West End avenue, but she declines to say one word about the matter.

Tells of Appeal to Him.

According to Betiero, Mrs. Adams came to him when she was in great distress of mind. She told him, he declares, that she and her husband had been living apart and that she wished he would use his influence to bring them together and induce Adams not to leave her out of his will.

Some of the lessons in Spiritualism and psychology, Betiero says, were given in his studio, while others were given in the camp at Oskawana, which Mrs. Adams visited just prior to her husband's death.

In the midst of some of these alleged seances Mrs. Adams is said to have appeared to the medium as a "shadowless figure upon a great silvery ball," and to have been surrounded with a golden aura, signifying that she was to be successful in her wish.

Betiero affirms that Mrs. Adams signed a written agreement that if he would see her husband and induce him to remember her in his will she would give the medium five per cent of all the money she received.

Claim to Have Contract.

This contract, it is claimed, is in the possession of the medium's lawyer, together with letters said to have been written by Mrs. Adams confirming parts of the contract and other facts set forth in the complaint.

The medium asserts that for several months Mrs. Adams required almost all of his attention. He says she wished to have many seances, and that in her desire to study the various mystic branches in which he claims to be an adept he was obliged to neglect all his other duties to attend to her case.

Betiero says he was introduced to Mr. Adams, and on several occasions visited him in company with Mrs. Adams, and had luncheon with them. He also visited Mr. Adams alone, he asserts, and declares the results of these visits was that Mr. Adams agreed upon the will which left to Mrs. Adams an estate which her lawyer admits is in excess of $2,000,000.

Betiero Talks of Spirits.

"I have been obliged to bring suit against Mrs. Adams," said Betiero, "although I think that if it were not for her daughters she would have fulfilled her contract with me.

"We had many seances, in which Mrs. Adams received assurances from the spirits that all would be well.

"Not one-quarter of the case has been suggested in my complaint. I have plenty of other proof of the justice of my claim."

"What happened at the seances?" the medium was asked.

"I have little idea, but it will come out at the trial if the suit has to go to court. She studied many things under my care, and she attended the meetings at Oskawana, and was a devoted pupil. Mr. Adams also seemed deedly impressed, and I should say that he died a complete believer in Spiritualism."

RECOVERS VOICE IN HYPNOTIC SLEEP.—SPIRITS DO IT.

Press Agent and Prima Donna's Chaperon Tell of Restoration.

The hypnotic eye made its appearance with Svengali in "Trilby," and in due time disappeared from the stage. May 7 the hypnotic voice received its first hearing at the Fifth Avenue theater, New York, where Miss Audray Maple, prima donna of a sketch called "The Love Waltz," made it known to the public.

Miss Maple, says the New York World, is the owner of the voice, but her press agent has an equity in it. Some weeks ago the prima donna found her vocal chords were becoming affected by the strain of singing at two daily performances, so that she hardly could make herself heard across the footlights. Moreover, serious nervousness developed.

Her press agent suggested she take treatment from Dr. John D. Quackenbos, of No. 331 West Twenty-eighth street, who hypnotizes subjects. Miss Maple accompanied by a chaperon, called on the doctor.

Dr. Quackenbos placed the young woman on a sofa and put her to sleep. He declared the singer's voice was strong and she could develop an exceedingly great range.

When Miss Maple awoke she spoke to the chaperon, and was amazed at the change in her tones. At least every one present says so. Her singing notes were even more remarkable. Not only was her voice stronger, but it was of greater range than formerly, and as for nervousness, she hadn't a bit.

At the evening performance the press agent, the stage manager and all the members of the company noted the vast improvement.

Verily while she was hypnotized, spirits cured her.

We are so vain as to set the highest value upon those things to which nature assigned the lowest place.—Seneca

MOVING PICTURES.

Trenchant Reflections in Regard to Selected Scenes from the Celebrated Passion Play, by F. M. Wickizer, Editor of The Reflector, Argos, Ind.

Selected scenes in moving pictures taken from the celebrated passion play were given this week at the electric theatre and many were deeply impressed with the lifelike portrayal of Christ's early history. The scenes given were all familiar to Biblical students and represented the birth of Christ, the appearance of the star of Bethlehem to the shepherds, their pilgrimage to the scene of birth, the flight of Joseph and Mary to Egypt to escape the wrath of Herod and, through it all, the marvelous hand of an unseen power in the form of angel spirits, guiding, protecting and blessing the parents and babe through all the vicissitudes that beset them in their journey o'er the hills and valleys in the ages long ago. A few of the scenes from this play are calculated to inspire the auditor and carry him to the heights of religious enthusiasm, a few depict the ancient savagery that possessed the human heart while others portray the matchless beauty that always and will continue ALWAYS to characterize the human soul in its true expression of life on this plane.

In reading the story and viewing the illustrations of this noted chapter in the world's history, however, it must require an extraordinary stretch of the imagination to believe nature would be so fickle in her laws. It must require a mountain of faith to carry one back over the span of twenty centuries to behold with credulous eyes and unprejudiced mind the performance then of marvelous phenomena and at the same time and with the same mind doubt the existence of such a law to-day, even regarding the mere suggestion of such a probability as sacrilegious and harmful to the church and religion, uncanny and "spooky." Notwithstanding the deep love, the spiritual guidance and the providential presence of an unseen power that was pictured with Mary and has been beautifully woven in verse and song to commemorate the world's greatest event from its very inception, many hard-headed students of Biblical history, probably just to be contrary, hang strongly to the belief that Joseph was deeply wronged and has all these years been denied a part of the credit justly due him as one of the leading characters in the drama of Jerusalem.

Compared to eternity, and even eternity does not nor can it change or altar the laws of nature, two thousand years is not the span of a human breath. It must surely require some little faith to believe the voice could come to Joseph and the angel visit Mary and minister unto her through the years of her trials in one breath, then, and in the next breath, now, this voice and this angel represent the very demons of fancied hell. How strange the provisions of nature would suddenly become perverted and render those ancient communications and spiritual manifestations sacred in one breath and cursed in another? Yet there are many that hang with a loyalty of desperation to every word and letter describing those wonderful miracles ascribed to the fishermen of Galilee and their leader who, to suggest to them the sacred law has not changed to this day is sufficient to throw them into a fit and invite from them the charge that such sauggestion is inspired by the devil or come from some distinguished functionary of evil designs and questionable motive.

The same natural law of gravity that dashed the tablets to fragments ages ago operates in the same unchangeable manner to-day and brings the rain drop to earth after the natural law of condensation renders it heavier than the space it occupies in the atmosphere. This same drop of water produces the same natural effect upon sprouting vegetation it produced for the crude farmer of Biblical history and the blade of grass that came forth at its gentle bidding to nurture the flocks on the hills of Judea is by nature the same blade of grass that carpets the earth in richest splendors of glory to-day. TRUE NATURE does not, never can change and such a thing as false nature never existed. If one single passage of Biblical history touching those early manifestations is true, and why should such a beautiful story be doubted, then the law that made them was a natural law true and unchangeable and exists to-day the same as it existed then.

It is not the want of a law to produce like results to-day but the want of a wholly unselfish, perfected manhood to work through an existing natural law that is as old as time itself.

WHAT IS RELIGION?

As Defined by G. Major Taber of Los Angeles, Cal.

In The Progressive Thinker of March 28, I noticed a very interesting comment on my former article, by my good Sister Spiritualist, E. K. Eager, who apparently differs with me only in name for our philosophy, and not in essential principles. The very name Religion has drawn to itself more quacks and hypocrites, and has done more harm to humanity than it has ever done good, for this reason: that the orthodox religion teaches as a fundamental principle that no matter how great the crime, Jesus can pardon the sinner. What is the result? a Christian who believes in the doctrine can transgress the moral law of right and wrong one day, and be forgotten the next. Such a doctrine has been the curse of the world. It teaches mankind that they may sin with impunity, which you and I do not believe.

I have had seven years' experience as a prominent officer in, two State prisons, and have been confidentially associated with thousands of criminals, and among them were preachers, doctors, and public officials, and have learned from that experience that those whose religion has taught them that if they receive no pardon here, there was no pardon of the future open to them.

In one of the prisons, I had a class of two hundred convicts, and without once mentioning religion, or Jesus, I impressed upon their minds the fact, that in the transgressions of laws they were only punishing themselves, as an evidence of their being behind stone walls and prison bars. One of the convicts remarked, "What if I committed a crime and no one found it out, where was the injury to me?"

My answer was, every time you look into the glass you must have realized that you were looking at the face of a scoundrel. The result was not one of my class, when their time expired, ever went back to crime, as they were fully convinced that it did not pay. Had I talked religion with them, I could have accomplished nothing. Sister Eager, you do not need to sail under any religious banner in order to do right; you do right because it is for your happiness, both here and hereafter. You may call "doing right," religion, but the name to me signified hypocrisy and a license to crime and not spiritual growth.

The name Religion is rotten with every crime in the calendar, and to sully our grand philosophy by associating in in the category of religion, smacks too much of catering to the Paganism of Orthodoxy.

Is it not a fact that wherever any church has had the power, persecution and murder follows in the name of religion. Sister Eager says it is "ignorance."

True, but the better name would be Religious Intolerance. Our philosophy is as much superior to the orthodox faith as truth is to error. Why then, place it on a par with the religion that teaches a falsehood, and is spending millions to corrupt the minds of ignorant heathen?

On the first page of The Progressive Thinker, listen to the message of the late Reverend DeWitt Talmage, where he closes with these words: "Keep the fire of brotherly love burning in your heart and you will never go wrong, for love lightens the whole world, and where love is there is no envy or strife."

Is there any orthodoxy in that, when you think of the millions murdered in the name of religion? I am still convinced that our grand discovery at Hydesville should not be trailed in the mire of orthodox religion.

Call it Spiritual Philosophy, anything but Religion.

THE HOUSE ON THE HILL.

I think of that house on the hillside,
Where roses run wild by the door;
And sunlight streamed through the big maples,
And lay on the old kitchen floor.
The green shady path in the wildwood,
Worn hard by the cows' passing feet;
The berries that grew in the meadow,
Red strawberries, luscious and sweet.

Kind hearts did that roof cover over,
Dear faces, how long they have lain,
So low, where the blossoming clover,
Is kissed by the dew and the rain.
Methinks in the mansions of heaven
They know all the sorrow I bear;
For sometimes I hear a glad footfall,
And feel a soft hand on my hair.

One summer, one fair, golden summer,
Shines out through the darkness of years;
As a star in the skies of winter,
More brilliant and clear appears.
For we stood near death's rushing river,
The angel of hope at our side;
It drew our lives closer together,
Knit cords that could never divide.

Afar from that house on the hillside,
Two wander with sorrowful tread;
From one cometh never a message
To tell whether living or dead.
And two, in the little old churchyard,
Sleep on 'neath the clover and rain;
I pray for them all in my dreaming,
And know I shall meet them again.

The new church will be founded on moral science. Poets, artists, musicians, philosophers, will be its prophet teachers. The noblest literature of the world will be its Bible. Thirty or More Camp Meetings.

Have They Outlived Their Usefulness?—Prof. Peck Versus Mr. Barrett, and Prof. Peck Versus Mr. Carrington.—Read and Reflect.

It is seldom that I find myself in serious disagreement with Brother Barrett's public utterances, but, in his timely and forceful article upon the Carrington experiences at Lily Dale he expresses views upon the subject of camp meetings from which I totally dissent, views which, in my opinion, are not only erroneous, but are liable to discourage some of the most efficient instrumentalities for the promotion of the cause of Spiritualism.

After stating the fact that many fake "mediums" find in the camp meetings a most prolific field for the exercise of their trickery, he writes, "Would it not be better for Spiritualism, better for the public, better for science and religion, to abandon camp work and turn the mental, spiritual and financial energies there expended into other and more helpful channels?"

Frankly, this plea strikes me as being as illogical as it would be to suggest that since fakers and tricksters invade the ranks of Spiritualism in such numbers, it would be better to abandon the cause altogether. That is like burning down one's house to get rid of the rats.

Let us examine some of the practical obstacles in the way of carrying out Brother Barrett's suggestion. Take, for instance, the M. V. S. A. camp at Clinton, Iowa. The Association owns there a beautiful park of some twenty acres within the limits of a city of 30,000 population, with the improvements—aside from cottages and private dwellings—this property is worth at least $25,000, free from all incumbrance. Suppose the members of this Association should become converts to Mr. Barrett's views. What then? According to the terms of the deed this plot of land must always be devoted to the purpose for which it is now used. It cannot be sold nor divided into lots, it must forever be a meeting place for the promulgation of Spiritualism.

But even if a legal loophole could be found to get around this plain provision of the deed—a not unlikely thing since the law and its exponents are as full of tricks and subtleties as the most accomplished of mediumistic fakers—what disposal should be made of the proceeds of the sale? Can Brother Barrett guarantee a plan that will net as much spiritual and intellectual profit as is derived from the present investment? Certainly no method or instrumentality so far employed has as yet furnished any proof of its superiority. It might be that the organization of a band of devoted workers—like the Salvation Army, for instance—to labor day and night among the whetched denizens of the slums and the prisoners would result in much greater returns. I know of nothing else that would.

Speaking from an experience in camp meeting methods and results exceeded by few if any in our ranks, I do not hesitate to say that with all their shortcomings, with all the evils that have clustered around them, camp meetings have been productive of at least as much benefit to the cause of Spiritualism as any other instrumentality. To thousands of Spiritualists they afford almost the only opportunity to meet with kindred minds and enjoy a spiritual and intellectual feast in listening to the leading speakers and mediums in ouur ranks.

It is safe to say that there are thousands of people who, but for the camp meetings, would never have enjoyed the privilege of hearing Brother Barrett's soul-inspiring discourses. And many intelligent persons, attracted at first by the novelty of such gatherings, have caught there the first glance of light which led them to liberty.

The almost universal testimony, of those who frequent the camps is that a few days' or weeks' sojourn amid their delightful surroundings acts as a tonic for body and mind.

Why the seeking of spiritual things amid the sweet influence of birds and trees, grass and flowers, pure air and sunshine, should be demoralizing, is a mystery too deep for me and I will have to be shown before I believe.

To abandon the camp meeting would not only inflict bitter pain and disappointment upon thousands of Spiritualists, but it would be a staggering blow to Spiritualism itself. I venture to assert, and challenge contradiction, that had the financial difficulties—now so successfully and happily removed—which lately threatened Lily Dale, resulted in its abandonment as a spiritual camp, it would have been as great a disaster to the cause of Spiritualism, at the very least, as would the dissolution of the N. S. A. itself. I think that nine-tenths of those who have enjoyed the delightful associations of that spiritual mecca in the past will agree with me.

No, the remedy is not to burn down the house, but to SMOKE OUT THE VERMIN.

DO NOT ABANDON THE CAMP MEETINGS, BUT REFORM THEM WHEREVER REFORM IS NEEDED. Difficult as this may be it can be done. It IS being done. The management of the various camp meetings have been severely and even bitterly criticised for permitting frauds to flourish upon their grounds, except in a few instances I feel sure those criticisms were not merited. Only those who have been connected with the administration of the multifarious and perplexing affairs of such an enterprise can realize the difficulties in the way of eliminating everything of a doubtful or questionable nature.

IF THEY HAD ONLY THE TRICKSTERS THEMSELVES TO DEAL WITH, THE PROBLEM WOULD BE A COMPARATIVELY SIMPLE ONE; BUT THE CHIEF OBSTACLE LIES IN THE GANG OF INFATUATED GULLIBLES WHO FORM THE TRAIN AND BODYGUARD OF EVEN THE MOST BRAZEN AND PALPABLE FAKE, AND WHO DENOUNCE EVERY EFFORT TO INSURE THE GENUINENESS OF PHENOMENA AS AN "ATTACK ON MEDIUMS."

Nevertheless, reforms have been and are being accomplished. Two years ago but one medium of a questionable character held forth on Clinton Camp grounds, and he was there against the will of the management, defended and supported by the aforesaid gullibles. Last year, though there were more than the usual number of mediums on the grounds, not a whisper, so far as I know, of doubt was heard against any of them. The result was one of the most harmonious, satisfactory and in all ways, successful sessions in the history of our camp.

There are too many camps just as there are too many weak and struggling societies in our cities, resulting in too great scattering of our forces.

Four-fifths of the existing camps might be abandoned with corresponding benefit to the remaining ones and to the cause. To establish securely a camp where it is really needed requires the outlay of a vast deal of time, labor and much money. And where it is so established it should be encouraged and supported by all Spiritualists within its territory. Every added camp in said territory not only lessens the usefulness of the older one, but generally, after a few years of struggle, goes down to its death, leaving a load of financial obligations upon the shoulders of its promoters.

So convinced am I of the importance of the camp meeting to the cause of Spiritualism that if I had the direction of the disposal of, say, one million dollars to the furtherance of that cause, I would devote one-half of it to strengthening and improving about ten of our leading "Spiritual Chautauquas," and the other half to such institutions as the Morris Pratt School, and the distribution of our literature and periodicals.

W. F. PECK.

St. Louis, Mo.

Prof. Hyslop's article introductory to Mr. Carrington's account of his experiences with mediums at Lily Dale is, in every way, admirable. While it lacks, necessarily, the spirit which warms those of us who are certain of our ground, yet it is such a clear, logical and convincing argument in favor of sane methods that every Spiritualist should read and reread it until its principles are fully incorporated into mind and heart.

The only weak spot in Mr. Hyslop's article was his recommendation that Spiritualists should leave the investigation of psychological phenomena to the "scientists" and abide by their conclusions. Since, however, in response to Dr. Warne's pertinent criticism, the Professor has frankly admitted that he was a little careless in the use of language and has substituted "scientific method" for "scientist." I am in perfect accord with his views.

For years in my public utterances I have advocated the scientific method which, as I comprehend it, is to exhaust every simple, normal and ordinary explanation of phenomena before resorting to the supernormal or spiritual hypothesis. Rats have been responsible for more haunted houses than ghosts ever were.

The example of such investigators as Professors Haré, Crookes, Zoelner and the members of the Society for Psychical Research might be followed with profit by all. This question, above all others perhaps, has a special and personal interest for every man, woman and child, and there is no reason on earth why any person of average intelligence may not investigate it for himself and do it, too, in a scientific manner.

That the methods pursued by the average Spiritualist—so far as the physical phenomena is concerned, at least—is UTTERLY VALUELESS, as Prof. Hyslop maintains is palpably true, and it is small wonder that men and women of intelligence, even when convinced of the substantial truth of our philosophy and of the phenomena underlying it, hesitate to call themselves Spiritualists or to be identified with our movement.

While the testimony of history and the experiments of our own days have established beyond reasonable doubt the reality of such phenomena, yet their rarity and infrequency and the delicate conditions requisite for their production naturally and logically call for extreme carefulness in testing all alleged occurrences of that nature. There can be no doubt that the laxity of our methods of investigation has been a STANDING TEMPTATION TO THE FRAUDS AND TRICKSTERS, especially when a golden harvest could be so easily garnered. "E. Z. Marks" have been very numerous and profitable picking in our ranks; yet it is an indisputable fact that many of the most confirmed and steadfast Spiritualists have been the most exacting and critical in their experiments, and their success in demonstrating the reality of these things under crucial scientific conditions, proves that Spiritualism is not dependent in any degree upon that which is questionable or doubtful. THERE HAS BEEN ENOUGH GENUINE PHENOMENA SINCE THE ADVENT OF MODERN SPIRITUALISM TO HAVE CONVERTED THE WHOLE CIVILIZED WORLD HAD THEY NOT BEEN NULLIFIED BY THE VAST AMOUNT OF COUNTERFEITS CIRCULATED AT THE SAME TIME AND UNDER THE SAME AUSPICES.

The publication of Mr. Carrington's experiences with the mediums at Lily Dale must RESULT IN GOOD, if it is only to make people more careful and critical, yet I must second Dr. Warne's regret that Mr. Carrington did not make charges against those whom he accused and give them a chance to defend themselves at the time. It is manifestly unjust that they should be tried and convicted, and that the world should accept the verdict of a court where, as Dr. Warne says, detective, witness, prosecuting attorney, jury and judge were all embodied in one person, and where the alleged culprits were not even heard in their own defense. Had an opportunity been offered them to defend themselves from the charges, and they had refused, then the inference would have been that they dare not stand trial and the case would have gone against them by default.

I do not feel to question Mr. Carrington's truthfulness nor the sincerity of his convictions as to the fraudulent nature of the performance he describes, but it should not be forgotten that he had already published a book in which he professes to explain all the tricks of "the medium game;" he therefore had a theory to sustain, and doubtless had prejudged the medium a fraud so that, however fair he meant to be, he was naturally biased more or less by that prejudice. His account, too, breathes something of the spirit of the reporter, who is looking for a readable story or "write up." But this is not all. In his published account occur some discrepancies which in a court of justice, would exert considerable influence in determining the reliability of his testimony, or his powers of observation.

For nistance, in his description of his sitting with Keeler he says that he wrote four questions while the medium was not in the room, and add: "I feel quite certain that he did not see the questions at that time." Yet later on he says the questions were written in the presence of the medium who manipulated and read the first one while the second was being written, and so on. Here is a discrepancy of so grave a nature as to demand an explanation.

I mention these things because justice demands that they be given due consideration; not that they overthrow Mr. Carrington's conclusions as a whole, FOR HIS EXPERIENCES COINCIDE SO CLOSELY WITH THOSE OF HUNDREDS OF OTHER ACUTE INVESTIGATORS AS TO MERIT AND DEMAND THE MOST RESPECTFUL CONSIDERATION, even though they are not necessarily conclusive.

Brief Explanation by Hereward Carrington.

To the Editor: I have read Mr. W. F. Peck's criticism of my Lily Dale report, and wish to say only one or two words in reply. If Mr. Peck had read my book on "The Physical Phenomena of Spiritualism," he would have seen that I defended the genuine phenomena in Part II. as strenuously as I exposed the fraudulent in Part I. and it seems to me that I cannot be accused of having any ax to grind or any way wishing a "write up."

As to the Keeler episode, I think if he will re-read the report, he will find the statement clear enough. I stated that my first two questions were written while Keeler was out of the room, but the second two questions were written when he was sitting on the opposite side of the table from myself, and that the names of my so-called relatives were inserted on all four slips, also while he was sitting across the table from me; thus, half the writing was done while he was out of the room and half when he was in it.

I hope this statement will make my article clear.

Spirit Messages.

Written by Mrs. Mary C. Lovering, Medium, Boston, Mass.

On wings of love I wend my way earthward and convince you I am not dead, but more fully alive than ever. I safely crossed the stream of time and anchored my barque at "Home, Sweet Home." My blessed Sunshine piloted me to the friends of yore, who extended their hands with joyful welcome to the beautiful fields of Paradise. Oh, that I could portray to you in words of love what met my gaze. Truly "Earth hath no sorrow that Heaven cannot heal." I found long ago ETAO,p-ETAO ITAOI NNN myself surrounded with friends of long ago, who were weaving flowers into beautiful garlands and cast around me, saying, "Hattie, your earth work is over; you were true to the voice of the spirit, faithful to duty; reap the reward of well doing." Then with one accord they joined in singing, "Nearer, My God to Thee," and "Our Beautiful Home Over There." How many times I joined you in singing it, and we are yet to meet again! I will be one to welcome you.

I am now free from bodily ills, free as a bird soaring in the atmosphere, gaining in strength, ready to go on with my spirit work now looming up before me. As I enter your presence on this material plane, I say, Is it possible I am free from that tedious suffering, I tried to patiently bear?

Sarah A. Byrnes grasped my hand, whom I had often seen in my sick room. She said, "Hattie, come with me to Mrs. Lovering, and she will write from you, for the sixtieth anniversary is near at hand, and though unseen, your voice can be heard again earth friends." Truly "Only a thin veil between us." Helen M. Flint is very near this morning, giving words of cheer. Your mother says Elmer will return home safe, benefited by the trip abroad.

And now my soul goes out to the dear daughter, over whom I felt such a solicitous care. To her I say: "Feel your mother is safe at home, one prepared by herself in earth life. She will ever watch over you; a mother's blessing rests upon you. Call for me when I am needed and you will feel my presence. Also to the other dear ones, I am thankful for all the watchful care bestowed upon me."

I would the Ladies' Aid Society be especially mentioned. I loved you all, and the happy hours spent in your midst will ever be a bright vision looming up in the future. I did what I could to make you happy; that is, with Sunshine's help.

Since this writing commenced many of the Old Veterans come around, say put in our names—J. Frank Baxter, William H. Banks, Jacob Edson, Dr. B. Storer, A. S. Haywood, Eben Cobb, Dr. E. D. Moore, Judge Nelson Cross, and many others. They say they are to hold a similar observance of the anniversary in these realms of light, and the spiritual influence will be felt by many earth mediums, for great is the light and knowledge and wisdom to descend upon earth's inhabitants in the near future. The pulpits have taken up the work, and the whole world will be revolutionized into the new thought of infinite intelligence, from the immortal shore of time, for great is the mystery of godliness, let earth rejoice, and all men enter into the sunlight of God's eternal presence.

Now, Mary, I have much more to earthly chance to make myself known say; this is a new experience; perhaps I have omitted some things I was going to say, but in time to come I hope to be more collected in my thoughts. I am so glad to feel the friends may once again hear from me; that I would have just this again through this friend and visitor. May heaven's choicest blessings rest upon all who hear and accept these words coming from

MRS. HATTIE C. MASON.

Read at the sixtieth anniversary of Modern Spiritualism, Mar. 27, 1908, at Ladies' Aid Society, Appleton hall, Boston, Mass.

From Rev. Warren H. Cudworth.

As the lady has just withdrawn, I will again speak and state it is a great pleasure to give words from our side of life and have it appreciated without a doubt. It is what is purports to be—letters from spirit life. You are the instrument used, we play upon you, the same as you do on the piano; when in good tune the better we can give our thoughts. It has been my privilege to welcome many newcomers this past year and introduce them to the joys awaiting. It thrills my soul with delight as they drink in the depths of divine love, and the satisfaction they feel in the exchange of conditions from earthly scenes to personal joys.

And now for one moment ascend with me the hills of light and note the mystical throngs of spirits who congregate together and rehearse earth's experiences, that brought them safely through all earthly trials and sorrows, and now they rest forever on the plane of thought, pointing out the way to greater heights of love in the future work before them.

I often enter your various churches and note the change in religious belief; the people are advancing out of superstitious errors and embracing the new thought as it comes to you, in writing from departed spirits. You were taught under your orthodox training you could go to them, but they could not return to you. I will state a large number of spirit friends have now assembled around you "en masse" as I advance, some recently assembled ones to watch the modus operandi of thought conveyance.

In spirit life many are attracted to the large cathedrals, and listen to the eloquence of divines who have been delving in the paths of learning for centuries, only satisfied in the paths of progress made plain by the wise men of the past, who pilot them along to the seats prepared for them by the sages of old.

I am an interested listener to many new ideas advanced, at other times gazing spellbound on the eloquence of the speakers.

In this, the twentieth, century, great wisdom is to descend upon the inhabitants of earth; they are already catching the sparkling sunbeams of hope and radiance from above; minister and people are testifying to the spiritual wave of thought penetrating the very air you breathe, thus inhaling into your being the sweet angelic breezes from the summerland of song and life made a joyful pilgrimage on earth plane.

Other spirits are interested in the study of medicine for the human system, others in the healing process without medicine; mind over matter; some are engaged in art and the sciences, making themselves proficient in the profession.

Others are attracted to the music spheres, and what could not be attained to while on earth, their aspirations can now be satisfied in spirit life, and the full scope of ambitious aims be realized.

I am often attracted into these spheres, and listen to the grand triumphant march of the progressionist as he stamps error under foot, clashes with old theology, and the light of truth brightens up the pathway so that no one may stumble or fall, but with an erect head press on to victory. Thus the Savior of mankind, "Truth's mighty power," will reign triumphant and all nations, languages and tongues proclaim Glory to God in the Highest; peace, good will unto men be the watchword forever.

As I again wend my way through your earth patch, I say yours is a beautiful world to enjoy, and yet heavenly attainments are gotten through no wearisome body; that is left behind; the spirit grows strong under the active duties of spirit life; it does not tire; work is rest; compensation sure. After being in spirit life a quarter of a century I am capable of defining the difference. Many of my parishioners I have with me. We exchange friendly salutations. Often we meet in little groups and speak of those still in the form. My sister draws near, and says: "Mrs. Lovering, that letter you read me from my brother opened my eyes to this wondrous truth. It was a new thought to me, which I accepted, feeling it was honest and sincere on your part."

I have often conversed with Mrs. Ellis; she says, keep right on; your eye fixed on the star of hope which points out the way, and you will safely anchor in the harbor of peace, and wave the hand of fellowship as you leave earth's scenes for celestial heights. And now, Mrs. Lovering, you may as impressed make use of these messages at the coming anniversary.

DEMONSTRATIONS OF SPIRIT POWER.

Showing That Spirits Can Move Things in Broad Day Light.

The space I now ask for is to publish what I, with many others, term a most remarkable demonstration from or through occult powers. Just who was the instrument for this manifestation, I cannot determine; but the day previous to my friend, Miss G., and I going to Clinton, on April 1, Miss G. went to the bank to draw some money. Upon her return home, she found upon opening the handbag, which was a very small and shallow one, that she had lost the bank book. Miss Garrette was alone when she went to the bank, and did not call on me until late in the evening, and she then said to my daughter and me, "I lost my bank book this afternoon." I said, as would anyone, "It is too bad, but I think you will find it."

She then turned to my daughter and said, "Gertrude, I wish, if not too much trouble, you would inquire in the different stores where I was, if they found a bank book."

Now, remember, friends, I had never seen Miss G.'s bank book, I was never in her home, so it cannot be attributed to my having anything to do with it, and should any doubt my veracity, write to my friend, for I assure you she is the soul of honor and goodness.

To proceed with my story: On Wednesday noon we went to Clinton. On Thursday morning I was giving an automatic written message by letter to a gentleman who had written for same, and while sitting in the parlor of Mrs. Ida B. Ward's home writing, Wannitta entranced me, and talked to Miss G. and Mrs. Ward while the message was being written. When Wannitta came, she began laughing, and Miss G. said to her, "Wannitta, did you do that?" (Miss G., it seems, had gone to her handbag for something, and there lay her bank book on top of everything; but she had said not a word to me about its being there.) "Wannitta, where did you find the book?"

"Your father find it laying under edge of bed in your room at home, and him give it to me, and me bring it to you."

Who was the instrument for this manifestation, friends; was it really necessary to have an instrument? Or could it not be done by my little guide independently?

Miss G., upon her return home that afternoon, previous to our going to Clinton, had emptied the contents of her hand bag upon her bed to make sure the book was not there, so consequently at that time it had fallen just where her spirit father had found it; I think I hear many exclaiming, "Show me!"

Well, friends, I wish I could, and also wish I could know who was instrumental in carrying that bank book from Cedar Rapids to Clinton, or was it done just independently without needing my assistance as an instrument between this and the spiritual realms of life?

While in Elgin, Iowa, I said to dear little Wannitta: "Will you bring, or do something while here, for Mr. and Mrs. Connor, that will prove your physical demonstrative powers?" She answered she would try. The day before I returned to Cedar Rapids, and early in the morning, while I stood talking (and I know neither one of us was thinking of Wannitta) to Mrs. Connor's mother, there was quite a loud noise, and there, in almost the middle of the floor lay a small photograph of Mrs. Arbuckle's granddaughter, having been taken from the frame in which three other card photos were placed. Neither one of us were near the frame, and neither one moving at the time it fell.

Wannitta does many such things, and always in the broad daylight, or when gas is burning bright, and when no one is looking for or expecting, anything of an occult nature.

Last summer, while attending camp, Mrs. Henderson (a very fine medium of Davenport), said: Mrs. Jaquet, you are going to have a change in controls, and for physical manifestation."

Wannitta was brought to me by my very much loved guide, Sunbeam, and she has, though very young, proven herself to be a wonderful spirit.

Friends, I have given herein only truth, founded upon bare facts, of what the friends, who have preceded us to the higher life can do to prove to mortals that the so-called death does not end all.

An Appreciative Letter.

To the Editor: I must write you and express my admiration of the grand paper you are giving to all earnest investigators of the truth—the incomparable Progressive Thinker. It is simply superb, and no one who wishes to keep abreast of the progressive thought of the age should be without its weekly visits. IT IS AN UPLIFTING POWER IN THE RANKS OF SPIRITUALISM. I am proud of your moral courage and your high conviction of duty, which will make The Progressive Thinker a potential factor for good in the great battle that is now and will be fought for truth. Brother Francis, keep the Searchlight on those who yet infest the ranks of Spiritualism until they are driven entirely out. Let none but genuine mediums represent our cause.

All honor and praise to Harrison D. Barrett for his review of Mr. Carrington's Report. I know the dishonest medium is trembling; he is reading the writing on the wall, and, like old Belshazzar, his doom is staring him in the face. But though fraud and duplicity have so long darkened the name of Spiritualism, yet amid all the gloom of night I believe there yet shines the radiant star of hope. I believe Spiritualism will yet arise from its long slumber and shake off once and forever the dark pall that enshrouds its glorious presence. I believe a better and grander day is beginning to dawn; the coming dawn is even now purpling the hilltops, and ere long the religion of the skies will bless at last the sons of men.

You have a strong force of writers. I enjoy those scintillations from Henry Morrison Tefft; they are fine, indeed. He is another Emerson. I am reminded of the sage of Concord while reading his epigrammatic sentences. You quote from another writer, Prof. Geo. B. Foster, of Chicago, who would be a valued contributor.

Long may you live to battle for the right is the wish of your friend,

Sunday Laws in the Far West.

In the far West, the spirit of fair play seems to have determined that in matters pertaining to religion, each shall believe or not, regardless of the narrow minded bigots who, in all communities, are public nuisances. A year or so ago some of this tribe in their fanatical efforts to convert the world to Christ, raked out an old statute of bygone days, which stated that all business shall cease on Sunday as well as all noisy amusements; it also included theatrical performances.

Of course this would apply to baseball, which is very popular in these parts, roller skating rinks and confectionery, fruit and cigar stands. They closed the saloons, which met with general approval; then they had the confectionery and cigar stores closed; then the roller skating rinks were the target of their attack, but to this some one had to swear that the music was annoying, but in place of that, these wicked people said that the music was enjoyable; and, balked in this, they tried to close the theater, whose attendance Sunday evening was such as to make the man of the cloth green with envy in comparison with their empty pews; but the court, in order to appease the wrath of these so-called holy people, said some flaw in the law rendered it inoperative.

This movement, as your readers will remember, was the result of a well-planned, concerted movement from ocean to ocean; but this blue law experiment collapsed completely, except the saloons close their doors Sunday with the approval of the masses, regardless of religion.

The liberal clergy in many instances deserve credit for this result; as an example, here in Tacoma recently, Rev. McLeod, pastor of one of the largest churches, stated that it was as necessary to have laws protecting the Sabbath as marriage. Rev. C. E. Knight, pastor of the Seventh Day Adventist church, through the Daily News, took issue with him by saying that a man or a company of men should not resort to compulsory methods to enforce Sabbath observance, and said the author of the Sabbath upheld him in his contention.—St. Mark 2:27. While marriage was a legal ceremony by its nature requiring a legal status, not a matter of belief or unbelief but an enactment to determine the rights of the wife and children as pertaining to inheritance and other matter. He said the business of the Legislature is not to see that one day in seven is religiously set aside, but that protection is given those who have set it aside under what they believe to have been a divine command, then if the church is to see that it is not frittered away, there are only two ways by which this can be done, viz., persuasion and compulsion, but the church cannot compel without the use of civil power, and when she secures that union of church and state a religious despotism is born. The only method consistent with Christian or religious intent is to persuade.

NOTES FROM ENGLAND.

Easter Reflections, by William E. Bonney.

We have just passed the period known throughout the civilized world as Easter, the time of year when all things seem to point toward a reawakening, when all nature teems with a wonderful newness of life, and the mind reverts to things spiritual as it gathers inspiration from this wealth of foliage and flower which begin to beautify the lanscape.

It is time for renewing and strengthening, if possible, old memories, old friendships and associations which are far off in a material sense, but in a spiritual sense very near and closely interwoven with our highest hopes and aspirations.

Easter is a time of special interest to Spiritualists, because it is near the time of their anniversary celebrations, and because it is the time of year for quickening and solidifying the hopes of mankind in regard to a continued existence.

We believe in nature as a great teacher at all times, but at no other time of year do we see so many evidences of the unseen forces which work underneath the surface, in the dark seance room of nature, if we may be allowed to use such an expression, that beautiful materializations may appear on every hand, not such forms as we have sometimes witnessed which only brought a feeling of disgust and disappointment, but beautiful, natural forms of flower, fruit and vegetable life, which help to make life more pleasant, and furnish food for our comfort and sustenance while on this mundane sphere.

Oh! that we could see coming from the cabinets of our workers on all occasions, materializations such as come from the cabinet of nature, grand, comforting and satisfying to all who witness them.

And yet again I venture to hope that sometime we shall be able to witness in some perhaps yet unsuspected manner more wonderful manifestations than we have yet been able to see, or that we have ever heard of.

Evolution is surely going on in the ranks of Spiritualists as well as in all other walks of life, and we must advance in unison with other movements.

Can we expect the best results in any form of mediumship, in the present great unrest which agitates the world? Can we hope for grand manifestations till war is abolished, peace is firmly established among the nations of the earth. The liquor traffic is more thoroughly controlled, poverty is done away with, and all men and women are educated in principles of honesty, sobriety and unselfishness?

Germs of Mind in Plants

By R. H. France, Translated by A. M. Simons.—Cloth, Illustrated, 50 Cents.

A cardinal point in the philosophical systems favored by the ruling classes is that the mind of man is something unique in the universe, governed by laws of its own that have no particular connection with physical laws. Modern science has proved that not only animals, but also plants receive impressions from the outside world and use data thus obtained to modify their movements for their own advantage, exactly as human beings do. These facts are told in this book in so charming and entertaining a style that the reader is carried along and does not realize until later the revolutionary significance of the facts.

"It is just such a book as one might expect from a man who looks back over seventy-six years spent in tireless pursuit of high ideals."—Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones, in Unity.

"The work is written in an easy, pleasing style, and is so interesting that we doubt if one reader in a score who commences one of the sketches will lay the book down until he has finished it."—The Arena.

Two Facts, One Solemn, the Other Cheerful.

It is a solemn fact that the Banner of Light, the Religio-Philosophical Journal, and the Light of Truth, have ceased to be. While they were gradually dying, it is a cheerful fact to know that The Progressive Thinker was prospering—prospering because its methods were in many respects diametrically opposite to them. If it had followed in the "old rut," endorsing frauds instead of exposing them, it, too, would long ago have joined the great majority of Spiritualist Papers that have passed to graves where their own "Policy Hearse" solemnly carried them.

A CRITICAL REVIEW

An Explanation by the Writer Why So Many Spiritualist Papers Have Died.

A timid and respectable little monthly devoted to the dissemination of an orthodox Spiritualism recently ventured an editorial opinion anent certain ideals which Spiritualists ought to adopt in practice. One of these ideals is a respectable Spiritualistic press; "free from bitterness, rant and rabid partisanship."

Those that care to observe humanity under the INFLUENCE OF RELIGIOUS IDEAS will find that each individual passes through certain definite stages of development in harmony with his temperament, mental combination and development. Every person converted to Spiritualism is affected in a similar manner. If he should be highly developed in the religious faculties and at the same time deficient in the faculties of perception and reason, he is sure to accept as facts all the glaring absurdities parading in the name of Spiritualism. Such a character can swallow much more than HE CAN DIGEST, and generally gets impatient with those that want to discriminate a little in what they accept as truth. It was no doubt a lack of knowledge that inspired the timid editorial alluded to above, since our press in the past has been above par so far as respectability is concerned. Every observing reader knows that our papers have been TOO GOOD, TOO "RESPECTABLE" TO TELL THE TRUTH, and therefore they have been of little service as an EDUCATIONAL MEDIUM to their readers.

But you ask: "Are your papers willfully deceiving their readers by making statements that are untrue?" THEY CERTAINLY ARE, EXCEPTING THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER, most of them, if not all, have been engaged in the past in establishing or apologizing for a fictitious Spiritualism. Their columns were crowded with the weary recitals of bogus phenomena which the fakers in mediumship were constantly palming off on a much abused public. There has been no class of phenomena yet coined by the fakers too marvelous for our papers to endorse; every fact reflecting adversely on Spiritualism and mediums was carefully suppressed by them, and the honeyed side presented instead. They coddled and pampered their readers with SWEET THINGS AS IF THEY WERE INFANTS OR IDIOTS, making them excellent subjects for mediumistic fakers.

But the uninformed and inquiring public is at last getting an education. The Progressive Thinker and the secular press are supplying them with facts that the timid and uninformed Spiritualists' press has neglected. The avowed policy of The Progressive Thinker TO PUBLISH FACTS, though they may be disagreeable for Spiritualists to consider, IS AN ENTIRELY NEW DEPARTURE FOR A SPIRITUALISTIC PAPER TO MAKE, though I believe the time will soon arrive when all papers devoted especially to Spiritualism will have to adopt a similar course of action or go out of circulation. Their dignity and respectability cannot save them, since several of our papers that embodied these qualities in a high degree have recently met a premature death. The Banner of Light, THE OLDEST, and at one time the most influential Spiritualistic paper of the world, was one among others to succumb. It was an exceedingly "dignified" paper, but it failed, except during the time it was under the control of Mr. Barrett, to keep abreast with the times. Its articles were generally too heavy and too dry for the average reader, and no time, during its last years, under Simonds, could it be called an interesting paper. It rarely exercised any discrimination in regard to mediumistic phenomena, but generally indorsed everything LABELED WITH THE "ISM."

The Religio-Philosophical Journal, at one time under the editorial management of J. R. Francis, had a circulation of 24,000, and was an immense success. When, many years afterwards (some fifteen, I think it was) published by Newman, it was an eminently "respectable" Spiritualists' paper, its circulation dwindling down to about 1,000, never had a Single CROSS WORD with a MEDIUMISTIC FAKER. It believed everything stalking about in the name of Spiritualism to be the gospel truth of nature, and every mountebank practicing as a medium to be a messenger of light between this world and the next. It served, therefore, no practical use to the cause it claimed to represent, but, in some respects, was a detriment to it. For years it endorsed and sustained a spurious Spiritualism; it always stood for policy instead of principle, and died lamented by nobody excepting the fakers. The Occidental Mystic, which was published in this city, lived and died a "respectable" Spiritualists' paper; it never said anything to anybody while alive; never threw a stone nor a piece of mud not even at a lonely faker! It never even had a row with Hugh Moore or Elsie Reynolds! But it loved everybody, excepting the antifakers. It was "free from rant, bitterness and partisanship," and had no convictions about anything. Shortly after its birth it died of pure "dignity" and "goodness," BELOVED BY ALL THE FAKERS on the Pacific coast.

The Light of Truth was also a highly "dignified" and "respectable" Spiritualists' paper. It was, I suppose, in late years wholly circulated in the interest of charlatanry in mediumship. To all the abuse heaped upon it by Spiritualists it never replied, but endured all in silence, while posing as a martyr to the public opinion of a skeptical world. It left a STENCH BEHIND IT that will not soon be forgotten, and it CAN ALWAYS BE POINTED TO AS THE MOST DISHONEST PRODUCTION THUS FAR INCORPORATED AMONG THE LITERATURE OF SPIRITUALISM.

It cannot be expected that a Spiritualists' paper expresses views altogether at variance with the views of its readers, since no one will support that which is opposed to his honest conviction and belief; nor can it be expected that our papers always supply correct information, for that would be impossible. But AN IDEAL PAPER cannot support that which is erroneous for the sake of bolstering up a belief or theory. IT OUGHT TO HAVE A CONSCIENCE, and its aim should be to uplift humanity—not to profit by its degradation. It should, in a measure, be the GUARDIAN OF ITS READERS, saving them when necessary from themselves, THE VIGILANT ON THE WATCH-TOWER, POINTING OUT ERRORS AND SUGGESTING REMEDIES. In short, while it must in a degree express views in harmony with those of its readers, it must be free and critical; it must deal honestly with all sides of a question, sifting truth from error in the interest of the education and advancement of its readers.

There is a great and important work for the Spiritualists' press of the world to do, if it will but rise to the occasion, and do it; it must HELP SPIRITUALISM ON TO A SOLID FOUNDATION, by constantly pointing out the many errors gathered in its sixty years' course. Emotional Spiritualists must be educated in facts and principles, and their unbridled enthusiasm restricted through a dominant educational force. But the first reformation must begin by ridding Spiritualism of THAT LARGE ARMY OF IMPOSTORS, living and thriving on it in the name of mediumship. Every community is infested by THESE WOLVES in sheep's clothing, and their record of crime is generally charged up to Spiritualism. Our movement, therefore, will not attain its proper position before the world, until it shall have openly disassociated itself from all willful dishonesty and deception. From the apathy and indifference of our present press toward this subject, one would suppose there was some special virtue in being deceived by fakers, or that their HOLLOW TRICKERY was essential to the LIFE AND GROWTH of Spiritualism.

Both from a financial and moral standpoint this question of what constitutes true mediumistic phenomena is a very important one. Hundreds of thousands of dollars are annually expended by Spiritualists in witnessing so-called phenomena that have no real existence. This money is not only a dead loss to investigating Spiritualists, but supports that undesirable class of which Spiritualism must rid itself at any cost. Spiritualists need this money, and it must be directed into worthy channels for their interest; it must be expended where it will bring satisfaction and delight to its owners, instead of humiliation and disappointment, as it does now.

But it is the moral aspect of this question of phenomena which is the most important. Harrison D. Barrett is a conscientious Spiritualist, and he claims that about five per cent of the physical phenomena are genuine. Hereward Carrington, another trustworthy authority, claims that two per cent of the phenomena may be genuine. Naturally these gentlemen could not of course locate even this small percentage of genuine phenomena, and no doubt merely made the expression to somewhat soften their statements. But even if it should be true that from two to five per cent of these phenomena be genuine, Spiritualists cannot in a general way endorse them. THE PERCENTAGE IS TOO SMALL, and the harm and confusion they would create would far outweigh any good they might confer. From facts at hand it is certain that the most DESPICABLE CRIMINALS are now practicing as mediums. They are constantly watched by the police of every community, because of the many complaints made against them by those they have victimized. IT IS, THEREFORE, HIGH TIME THAT EVERY HONEST SPIRITUALIST DECLARE AGAINST THEM; EVERY SPIRITUALIST SOCIETY SHOULD KEEP THEM OFF THEIR PLATFORM; EVERY SPIRITUALIST PAPER SHOULD DENOUNCE THEM.

The mental phases of the phenomena are now, in some instances, being successfully imitated as well, which conclusively proves that all the external evidences we have are often unreliable and unsatisfactory. Hence we should more and more seek the evidences of immortality which come through our reason and intuition. Such evidences are open to all, without price, and can never be monopolized nor produced to order for money. THERE IS NOT THE LEAST DOUBT BUT THAT MAN'S IMMORTALITY, AS WELL AS THE SPIRIT WORLD, CAN STEP BY STEP BE INFERENTIALLY PROVEN.

WORDS THAT VIBRATE

They Emanate From the Pen of Harrison D. Barrett, and Convey an Important Lesson.

VIGOROUS REMARKS ON AN OLD SUBJECT.

Of Pressing and Vital Importance to the Cause of Spiritualism.

Oh, the agony of soul, the anguish of mind, the painful heartthrobs, the cruel mocking of the tender emotions of one's being, experienced in everyday life by sensitive mortals whose natures have been attuned to vibrate in accord with the melodies and harmonies of the "Morning Land!" Why, WHY must all these things be? Why do mortals impale their sensitive brethren upon the torture-hooks of scandal and slander? Why is it that a boy or a girl, or a man or a woman, who is doing his or her best in moral endeavor, in purity of thought and aspiration, is made to pay such a fearful price for spiritual freedom when he or she steps out into the limelight, where every effort and its purpose can be determined by the onlookers, should they but pause to test appearances? Are the results obtained by the sufferers commensurate with the price they pay for them? Joan of Arc purchased the crown of an Archangel through her spirit's apotheosis at the stake. Do our modern Joans do likewise? Who is there on earth wise enough to respond to these queries?

Men of the noblest of purposes, or the purest of lives, women of the highest characters, of the sweetest, truest and most spiritual natures, are tied to the stakes of hatred, envy, malice, jealousy and prejudice in hundreds of communities, and burned slowly with the green wood of suspicion until all of their ambitions to do for their fellowmen, all of their zeal to accomplish something that shall add to the happiness of the world, all of their ideals for the spiritual illumination of the race, fall around them in the gray ashes of despair, in the black soot of sorrow and grime of distrust. As church members, or non-church members, their friends and neighbors had only words of praise to say of and for them. As Spiritualist speakers and mediums, the Spiritualists, egged on and prompted by other speakers and mediums, have only the fiercest and cruelest of invectives, the bitterest of condemnations to say of or about them. Why is this? In accepting Spiritualism, have they suddenly become Pariahs to their brethren? In days of old, some one said, "See how these Christians love one another!" Apply that saying to present-day Spiritualists, and see if the moral will not deduce itself.

In gatherings of Spiritualists, mediums in particular, some take special delight in tearing into shreds the characters of those of their fellow workers who are NOT present. Every crime in the category of crimes, murder sometimes not excepted, is laid at the doors of the absentees. If one-tenth of what is said against those under the harrow of discussion be true, it would be enough in any court of justice to place the offenders behind prison walls for life. It would seem as if the worst enemies of Spiritualism and of Spiritualists were the Spiritualists themselves. It is true, as was said years ago, "Spiritualism survives—not because of its friends, but in spite of them." In listening to such fulminations against people who have no chance to defend themselves, an outsider can but wonder that such things can be, and is not to blame if he asks "Cui bono?" as to Spiritualism itself. All great movements are rightfully judged by the people who come before the public as their representatives. Spiritualism is no exception to the rule. So long as Spiritualists persist in tearing their workers into inch bits, so long as they delight in scandal and social filth of al sorts, just so long will Spiritualism be looked upon with suspicion by non-Spiritualists.

There should be no condoning of knavery of any sort. It does no harm to call a spade a spade, but—it should be well determined that said implement IS a spade before any public declaration to that effect is made. The exposure of guilt does not necessitate the assassination of character. The question of morality for one person to does not mean that some one else should be destroyed to build the other one up. If mediums and speakers are guilty of fraud, and there is evidence to sustain a charge against them, let that evidence be reduced to writing, and submitted to proper authority for the determinateon of the facts. Upon the finding of the facts, let the public be informed, pro and con, a proper record made, and then proceed to take up other matters. There are two conditions among the Spiritualists of America concerning which no honest man or woman should remain silent. The one is the fraud question—the other that of slandering our platform workers and representative laymen.

If Spiritualism does not make its followers better men and women, it should be stamped out by the strong arm of outraged morality and justice. The condonation of fraud is proof positive that there is something lacking in the moral nature of the one who does it. The treasurer of one of the State Spiritualist Associations was caught acting as a confederate for a bogus materializing medium. Asked why he did it, his reply was to the point: "It makes people happy to believe in Spiritualism, hence I am doing them just as much good as if the work was genuine!" Here is the old Jesuitical argument: "The end justifies the means!" Does it? Is deception of such a wickedly cruel sort ever justifiable? Is it ever right to feed people on diseased or impure material or spiritual food? There is one in stance in American history where an affirmative answer can be found. Under government authority it was right to feed the soldiers embalmed and poisoned beef, and wrong to condemn it. But is this the ethics of Spiritualism?

Some honest-souled Spiritualists deplore the exposure of frauds and their methods of work on the ground that those who are ethically weak, or lacking in moral poise, are thereby instructed in counterfeiting, and inspired to enter the field as deceivers of the people. Possibly there may be a modicum of truth behind this statement, but it will not appeal to clear-headed rationalists as being sound in fact. A man is caught counterfeiting government money. His devices are new and strange. Is it morally safe to cover up this man's arrest or to prevent his methods from being thoroughly exposed? Apply that question to bogus mediums and their tricks; what would eventuate from such a condition? Counterfeiting proves one great fact, i. e., that there is something genuine to be counterfeited! When, however, the genuine coin is obtainable, why should any one be content with spurious representatives of it? Should not the fearless exposer of fraud, the one who dares to lay bare the tricks of the charlatan, be honored and encouraged in his work, rather than denounced and condemned?

Spiritualism has great need of a Hercules having the strength and courage of the one of old who turned the river Alpheus from its course, and thereby cleansed the Augean stables of all their impurities. The river that flows through the realm of Spiritualism is Spirituality, and if a modern Hercules could and would turn its wholesome waters into a new channel of honest fact, the Augean stables of fraud, scandal, slander, gossip and ignorance would soon be purified.

Fraud is bad enough; its open defense and excusing are much worse. The trickster is not so bad as the one who condones and upholds him in his nefarious practices. The trickster and his abettor are angels of light and purity when compared with those who occupy themselves with gossip, slander and scandal-mongering! Luetgert, who killed his wife and sold the sausage he made out of her body, is an archangel of love and beauty when contrasted with the man or woman whose sole aim is the assassination of character and mental integrity of a friend, or neighbor in the marketplaces of honest endeavor. "Fraud must go" is a good rallying cry for all honest Spiritualists, but if they would succeed, they must add to it the words, "and gossip, scandal and slander cease forever!" Fraud is but a full-blood brother of the other three greater evils. Cowardly teachers used to thrash the small boys and allow the large ones to do as they pleased. Spiritualists have been equally cowardly in thrashing the small boy of fraud, and have even smiled in approval at the diabolisms of gossip, scandal and slander.

Horace Greeley once said, when asked about the resumption of specie payments, "The best way to resume, is to resume!" The best way to get rid of gossip, scandal and their smaller brother, fraud, is to stop all use of or association with them. Resume the practice of saying and doing kind, honest and truthful things, and all untoward conditions will vanish forever. Instead of vilifying a person behind his back, then greeting him with a kiss, or a warm handclasp, or a smile of approval, be manly enough, be womanly enough, to stop all vilification, and cultivate the rare art of thinking the BEST of every one. "Give of your best, and the best will come back to you," is a truism. Let a thief be convinced you really trust him, and he will never betray you. No one will indulge in gossip, slander and scandal unless he has within himself the self-same element he attributes to one whom he condemns! To rid the world of these fearful evils, the individual must first remove them from his own nature. The words of the writer in the Bible who speaks of the mote and the beam in certain eyes can well be applied to the lives of Spiritualists to-day. Look for the good in the lives of men, and rich mines thereof will surely be found. Speak no evil; think no evil; act, no evil. Trust begets trust. Goodness is a concrete principle, not an abstract glittering generality. Live the principle, and all phantom abstractions and shadows will disappear forever.

Yours for truth,

HARRISON D. BARRETT.

A Divine Lesson.

HIGH IDEALS.

Yes, High Ideals, Beautifully and Comprehensively Portrayed by the Great Liberalist, Dr. Madison C. Peters.

If you are content with what you have done you will stand but a small chance of becoming famous for what you will do. Progression is a law of nature. You cannot stand still; you either must go onward and upward or backward and downward; you never can remain stationary. The man who gives up the life fight and relinquishes his gun before the last shot is fired already is dead as far as the world is concerned, and the grass might as well be waving above his grave.

The spirit that will not make the effort to soar aloft must remain on the ground and grovel amid the dust of its surroundings and become of the earth, earthy.

Failure is pardonable after honest endeavor, but a low aim is a crime against the world as well as the most flagrant injustice to self.

He who aims at a star will hit the tree top, but he who looks no higher than his own level will strike the mud at his feet.

Cannot Live Without Ideals.

There MUST BE IDEALS IN LIFE, otherwise there can be no inspiration for confidence, nor can existence be transformed, as it should be, into a grand, sweet symphony of harmony in which all the notes sound a perfect key. We must have an end in view and keep the eye constantly upon it, if we would reach a right destination and fulfill our mission on eaarth as we should.

It is possible for all to ascend the heights if the powers of attainment are only exerted, but some there are who let these powers lie dormant and never rouse them to worthy action.

The limbs, the legs, the arms, if not used BECOME ATROPHIED and unable to perform their parts; it is the same with the mental qualities. To bring them to their best they must be exercised, the oftener the better, for perfection only can be reached by constant use of those faculties which place men on an eminence above the rest of the creation.

A DEFINITE AIM always must be kept in view; the man who never loses sight of his aim finally will grasp it. Ambition will carry him along and nerve him to put forward all that is in him to reach the desired end.

Meaning of the Mysterious "V."

Horace Maynard when he entered Amherst put a large "V" over the door to his room. Others ridiculed what they looked upon as an eccentricity or absurdity. Maynard smiled and asked them if they could not infer the meaning of the letter. In time they were enlightened. When the plodding student became valedictorian of his class the meaning of the cabalistic letter flashed upon them with stunning surprise. From the first the word, valedictory, had the foremost place in Maynard's mental lexicon.

Nothing so strengthens the mind, enlarges the manhood, widens the thought as constant effort to MEASURE UP YOUR IDEAL. The desire to come up to its standard stretches the mind, makes it elastic to encompass all purposes, and touches life to finer issues.

Of course all the expectations of youth may not be fulfilled, for often nature holds back some of her wages, lest we quit work and sit down contented with a share when we could have had the whole.

Whenever the spirit flags, when the disposition comes to let the world take its course without interference or effort on our part, the ambition must be fired to set the machinery again in motion. We must not wait for something to turn up, but earnestly set about and turn up something.

Garfield, when he made up his mind to get an education, split wood for fifty days to get $50 to meet expenses. Then, when he had managed to get his foot on the ladder, he resorted to every honest endeavor to mount higher. He rang bells, swept houses, and did general chores. In the end he triumphed over all obstacles and succeeded in carving his name on the topmost notch in his country's history.

To a man with a will and a purpose there is nothing impossible. Such a man can do anything; he can accomplish seeming miracles. Once he puts his shoulder to the wheel he never lets the spokes turn in a backward direction, but always pushes them onward and forward inch by inch and revolution by revolution until he rolls them to the top of the hill.

Will Overcomes All Obstacles.

When indomitable will is combined with LOFTY IDEALS no hindrance can block the way to the pinnacle of success. Poverty, so far from being a drawback, becomes an incentive to an iron will and invincible determination to overcome trials and crosses and all kinds of impediments to reach the goal that lies away in the far land of manly endeavor and honest effort.

Therefore, call up the power of will and harness them to the wagon of endeavor and you have nothing to fear, for nothing can prevail against you. You are bound to reach the heaven for which you steer, the port to which the winds of pluck and determination will bring your craft after a safe voyage, no matter how stormy, or how much you may have been buffeted by fate.

Remember the object of life is to grow. There is a progress from the cradle to the grave. As an atom of the universe you must go on—let it be on to success, not to failure.

Don't indulge in aimless reverie, but have a definite aim and always keep it in the light of attainment, never letting the shadows of doubt or uncertainty fall athwart your path.

Ideal Determines the Character.

KEEP YOUR IDEAL constantly before you, never lose sight of it. THE IDEALISTS have transformed the world and spurred their kind on to effort and accomplishment. They have made us great by mingling with our daily pursuits transcendent conceptions and so have thrown around our daily life, our sensuous life, the grandeur of a better.

THE IDEAL in all instances determines the character. What right has a man to choose a low calling, when a higher one is possible? Why should a man stunt his moral faculties in a base pursuit when a respectable one is open to him and one which would enlarge and ennoble his soul? Why should he turn his back on all that lends to life its majesty and dignity and refuse to extract from it all the good that it holds for those who will but avail themselves of its sweetness and bounty?

Let the longing TO DO SOME GOOD THING, to be somebody in the world, find its noblest expression in the impulse to do your best. Enthusiasm for the best alone lifts life on a plane worth living.

Don't dream of a position where drudgery is unknown. There are few sinecures in this age, and such in the end place nothing on the credit side of life's ledger. Let your heart be in your work and aspiration after better things will become inspiration to accomplish them.

The above from Mr. Peters is especially important. Every Spiritualist should have HIGH IDEALS, for without them progress or spiritual unfoldment is impossible.

IDEALIST.

Letter from Hoquiam, Wash.

I want to thank Mr. Little, our state president of this state, through your valuable paper, for sending us such a noble woman and such a grand worker in our cause as Rev. Mrs. Emma Lapworth of Seattle. She is a fine medium and a fine lecturer. She held a meeting in my parlor on the night of the 1st with good results, and on the night of the 2d she gave a lecture in Ogden's hall, and on Sunday, the 3d, she gave a lecture in the A. O. U. W. hall, and also at 7:30 in the evening, and all with good results. She also had an invitation from the Hotel Arlington proprietor to hold a circle at the hotel parlor Monday evening, which she did. The results were fine. Sixty-three were present and enjoyed two hours of spirit messages. Mrs. Lapworth had as assistants two little girls, twins, eight years old, grandchildren of mine. This was their first attempt in public. The first we knew that they were clairvoyants was a week ago. Two messages were given by them and recognized.

Mrs. Lapworth advised us how to get best results for the cause through the children.

I am happy to say that she has developed a good writing medium in the person of Mrs. Cramer, who lives here, so now from this on we will hold our circles once a week.

I have worked hard for the last two years and spent lots of money in getting mediums to come here to lecture and give tests in our cause, and I have always got the best, and by so doing, as the orthodox would put it, my measure is full and running over, and I hope it won't be long now till we can organize a class here that our State Association will be proud of and you, Mr. Editor, look out for subscribers for The Progressive Thinker from Hoquiam.

I wish to say that those little twins sit ten minutes every dat at 3:30, and they never fail to geet good messages for us, and it is a hard blow to the skeptical to see those two little girls, only eight years old, go into trance and give such fine messages. They all say, "Well that beats everything we ever saw; that is all honest, for the little ones don't know anything about frauds.

From Dream to Vision of Life

By Lilian Whiting, Author of "The World Beautiful," "The Spiritual Significance," "The Outlook Beautiful," etc.

This book finds its keynote in the question asked by the Archbishop of Canterbury—"The Life Beyond,—what it it? What is its bearing on these present working years?" To the discussion of this vital problem Miss Whiting brings the results of modern scientific research and that peculiar spiritual clairvoyance which has been remarked in "The Life Radiant" and some of her other books. It is written with a certain joyous vitality that communicates itself to the reader in a certain radiance and liberation of new energies. Price $1.00 net.

Was Jesus a Jew?

Now comes another question, "Was Jesus a Jew?" The question is not, "Was Jesus a God?" but was he a descendant of Abraham, from whose loins all Jews claim to have descended.

Prof. Paul Haupt, an eminent Assyriologist and Orientalist, who occupies the chair of Semitic languages in the Johns Hopkins University, in a paper recently read before the American Philosophical Society, decides in the negative, and says, Our blessed Lord was not a Jew, but sprang from the Aryan stock, the same stock as the Grecians, Romans and Anglo-Saxons."

All the pictures extant of the junior God represent a person of the Caucasian race, and are fraudulent if the Master was not a Jew. His biographers traced his ancestry all the way back to Abraham, through different parents, upwards of fifty generations, meeting with Solomon, he of 700 wives and 300 concubines, going that bad man, Brigham Young, fifty odd times better.

If Prof. Haupt will turn his brilliant searchlight on Nazareth he will find a fact in connection with that subject worthy of note. There was no such city as Nazareth in the time accredited to Jesus, and probably not until the Crusades, when the city was invented and located, to supply a supposed need. Such a city is not mentioned in the Old Testament, or by Josephus, neither by Paul.

A Nazarite is described in Numbers, 6: He is represented as a person who was to dedicate himself to the Lord; to abstain from wine and all intoxicants; no razor was to come upon his head, but the locks of his hair were allowed to grow. Samson, whose great strength was in his hair, was of this Order. Mat. 2:23, says: "He [Jesus] came and dwelt in a city called Nazareth that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophets, 'He shall be called a Nazarine.'" So to make Jesus a Nazarene the Bible-makers knew no other way than to make a city, Nazareth.

The practice of manufacturing cities to supply Christian needs, was not limited to Nazareth. Mary Magdalene was a case in point. The word magdalene, in its original, is equivalent to harlot. It was so understood by priest and layman. Our lexicographers, in giving it the proper meaning, softened it somewhat by inserting REFORMED before its real meaning, but of late years, and to remove the odium from "our Savior" for associating with such a character, have located, for the benefit of gulls, on the west coast of the Sea of Galilee, a CITY which they call Magdala. The word magdal, in Greek, signifies "towering cliffs." It actually describes the physical condition of that coast, and leaves no possible place on which to locate a city. No ruins of a city were found there; but the need was great, and recent writers have supplied one to meet the great wants. So Mary, of Magdala now sounds better on every sensitive Christian ear; and, with the uneducated, removes the proof that Jesus consorted with "sinners." See Luke 7:34, 37.

Attention, Spiritualists!

An Important Communication from a Leading Author and Prestidigitator, Establishing Spirit Return, Will Be Published Next Week.

LOOK OUT FOR IT!

THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER takes the lead in all things pertaining to SPIRIT RETURN or occult matters generally.

It is EDUCATIONAL all along the lines of our phenomena and philosophy.

It fully realizes that SPIRIT RETURN is an important fact, a sublime fact, a fact scintillating with IMMORTALITY, a fact that has made an impression on the world for good as no other fact has. And when it is possible to clinch that fact with THE TESTIMONY of an expert, one who is clear-headed, and a skillful performer in sleight-of-hand, a master magician, as it were, and one who can not be deceived as to phenomena, we seize on the opportunity, and our readers get the benefit of the same. We have procured permission from the OPEN COURT, a leading scientific magazine of Chicago, to republish a copyright article by David P. Abbott, a prestidigitator, an author of note, and a man of marked ability, giving a full account of his visit to the home of Mrs. Elizabeth Blake, of Broderick, Ohio.

In some respects the narrative reads like a FAIRY TALE, yet it fully ESTABLISHES the fact of SPIRIT RETURN in BROAD DAYLIGHT, and even when a sitter practices DECEPTION by assuming, as Mr. Carrington did, a fictitious name, thus "knocking out" the theory that if you go to an honest medium with deception, you will get fraud in return. Coming from the source it does, we consider Mr. Abbott's experience with Mrs. Blake at her home one of the most IMPORTANT PRODUCTIONS of the twentieth century, and worth at least one year's subscription to The Progressive Thinker, which leads as an educational factor in Spiritualism.

Departed and Departing Glory.

We casually remarked in the presence of a good Methodist friend during the last week, that "information from all directions seem to indicate Christianity is in its decline, and those who are active members of orthodox churches are beginning to question the divinity of the junior member of the Godhead, and are not quite sure the Holy Ghost was really personified by a dove when the "blessed Jesus" was baptized.

"Don't believe yourself," he replied, with a skeptical laugh. "There has been no period in the world's history when Christianity was making such rapid strides toward universal conquest as now." He was doubtless sincere, as we know we were.

The very next day after the conversation mentioned, our eye fell on the following in our morning paper. It was news to us, and will be to our readers. We copy headline and all without change or addition:

"Church Decline in New York City.—The truth is there are fewer Baptists, Methodists and Presbyterians in New York to-day than there were twenty-five years ago, though the city's population has been more than doubled. The rapid extinction of churches of these denominations in Manhattan during the past decade shows this. In 1896 the Baptists reported sixty-four churches. Last year they only claimed forty-eight. Many of these claims are pitiful absurdities—mere names of mission halls and soup kitchens, supported by the charity of one or two rich men. One-half of them represent hopes as yet unfulfilled, declares Thomas Dixon, Jr., in an article in the May number of the New Broadway Magazine. The same thing is true of the Methodists, who reported seventy-three churches in 1896, and only claim fifty-nine in 1907. The Presbyterians reported seventy-one in 1896 and only fifty-seven last year. In the year 1840 New York city had one church to every 1,800 in population. Last year we could not find one church to 4,000 population, counting all our soup kitchens and mission halls as "churches." There are many sections of the city which are practically pagan. One district of 16,000 population, which is typical of many more, has one saloon to 111 inhabitants, and one church to 8,196. In another large district there are some 50,000 inhabitants with a saloon to every 200 people and a church to every 10,000. In the section between Twenty-fourth and Fifty-ninth streets west of Ninth avenue there is but one church to 15,000; while the district between Fortieth and Sixty-fourth streets west of Tenth avenue contains 46,563 people, and has but one church. And the sad part of the story is that many of these churches that are reckoned on the map as living and performing their duties to these vast populations are dead and don't know it."

Fewer members of the leading churches in New York to-day than there were twenty-five years ago, though the population of the city has doubled in that time! There are localities where it is probable, with redoubled effort, in which the membership may have advanced; but the country at large will show a decline.

One remark from our friend greatly pleased us, and it is worth recording. He said: "I will admit I have lost confidence in the popular teaching regarding hell." It was unfortunate we did not press the inquiry in that direction. The Inquisition silenced! No sale of criminal indulgences for revenues; no wars to propagate the faith; and hell eliminated from the creeds, what remains of Christianity as taught 300 years ago? Standing erect, with folded hands, and eyes aloft, we pray our brother, weep for glories fled! At the same rate of decadence where will be the churches of New York with the close of another twenty-five years?

Be kind to everybody, but especially to the aged, for we are all traveling that way very rapidly.

Hold your thoughts, your mind, your will in principle and you will succeed.—Huling.

The world is continually growing better to all who are honestly trying to make it better.—Everett McNeil.

Revelation vs. Science.

"And God said * * * I do set my bow in the cloud, and it shall be for a token between me and the earth. And it shall come to pass, when I bring a cloud over the earth, that the bow shall be seen in the cloud."—Gen. 9: 12, 13, 14.

This was the device planned by God, according to his own inspired word, for the rainbow.

Says science: "Rainbows are produced by the refraction and dispersion of light in passing through raindrops, reflected back from the drops on the sky or cloud, and presenting itself in the form of an arch with prismatic colors. So long as sun has shone, rain has fallen, and there were eyes to see the rainbow has been."

The priest who wrote Genesis, ignorant of science, gave the best idea his genius could devise for the phenomenon, and credited to God his ignorance. All the miracles in the Bible contravening natural law, are impositions on ignorance, and betray the falsity of the claim to divine origin.

Wandering over the hills and mountains of Palestine, Arabia, or any other country; boulders, rocks, pebbles and sand furnish the traveller evidence they were water-worn. They have rolled along the bed of ancient rivers, or been dashed together by the surging sea. In process of ages, by some mighty convulsion, they have been uplifted; mountain chains and even whole continents and great islands the product. A priest who knows all about God, and whose mission is to teach that knowledge to his fellow, used to burn him if he would not believe his story. He knew nothing of geology; nothing of the natural forces ever active; so ascribed to God and miracle. The regret is, well educated people neglect to THINK, so childhood teaching and impressions go with them through life, and are transmitted to another thoughtless generation.

Truth Abounded Through a Lie.

There is a trickster game known as thimble-rigging, a sort of gambling device, which is manipulated to defraud the credulous. Three thimble-shaped cups are used with a ball. The latter is placed on a board, or table, and is covered by one of the cups. These cups are quickly shifted in position and a wager is made as to which covers the ball. By a nice mechanical device inside the cups the ball is apparently removed by the player and is found under neither cup, else under a different one from that supposed, so the game becomes in effect quite equal to flipping the copper with "Heads I win, tails you lose."

Are the Christian clergy encouraging in results the practice of substantially this thimble-rig game in the form of materializing? For we are sure no Spiritualist will resort to such detestable methods as is practiced by the vile to impose impostor spirits on the credulous, not solely for the money there is in it, but to bring Spiritualism into disrepute.

The Punch and Judy shows of the Elsie Reynolds variety, with "now you see a spirit and now you don't," with cheese cloth accompaniments, seem closely allied to the fraternity of tricksters.

If it is not the preachers who are encouraging the mediumistic frauds, who is it that is back of them? They were taught by the good Paul, virtually, to lie and deceive for the glory of God. See Romans 3:7.

Shun passion; fold the hands of thrift; sit still—and truth is near.—Emerson.

I had rather be damned with Plato and Lord Bacon than go to heaven with Paley and Malthus.—Shelley.

TRANSITION CALLED DEATH SUBLIME.

Impressive Words by Mrs. M. T. Longley, at the Funeral of C. C. Sailer.

Messages, says the Washington Times, accredited to C. C. Sailer, who died lately, were delivered by another Spiritualist to a hundred or more friends and relatives who gathered around his bier at 3129 N street northwest, Washington, D. C., to pay a final tribute to his memory. Mr. Sailer was buried in Oak Hill cemetery.

"There is no death. What seems to be, is transition," said Mary Longley, who delivered the sermon. Our friend was a Spiritualist. He believed in its tenets and precepts. He sends this message to you: 'Spiritualism is pure. It lives in the heart, abides in the memory, and is beautiful, comforting, and heavenly.'"

Mrs. Longley's sermon, which was delivered without notes, was a literary gem. There were those at the funeral services who scoff at Spiritualism, but all agreed that this gifted woman took the most philosophical and beautiful attitude toward the harvesting of the Grim Reaper that could be imagined.

Thanks for Death.

For more than half an hour she held the mourners, and by her eloquence, transported all of them into realms of serenity and tranquillity. More striking than this was a prayer which Mrs. Longley made at the conclusion of her sermon. In it she thanked Providence for causing the death of one of her best friends. Jarring as this seems, it sounded beautiful as the words flowed from the lips of the speaker. It was a tearless funeral.

"He is not dead," declared Mrs. Longley. "His spirit has been released from the bondage of a physical frame, but has flown to a higher, nobler, grander and brighter world. We thank the Great Spirit for delivering him and we know from this dear friend that he has been reunited with loved ones, dwells in a sphere infinitely more beautiful than this mundane earth, and is happy in his rejoicing. His spirit is immortal. Though the deeds of his life may never be made in bronze or stone, the memory of his good, kind life will remain with us long after metals and minerals have crumbled. Nature has simply claimed her own and demanded the elements and atoms composing the dwelling house of his kindly spirit to continue her reproduction. Death is liberation of the spirit and should be met with exultant joy rather than fear. We hear from our friend to-day that there is happiness in what is called death, and we know that he is grateful for deliverance at the time he was ripe in years, wealthy in experience, and happy to be ushered into that beauteous great beyond.

Sufferings Would Increase.

He might have lived many years more, but his infirmities would have multiplied and his sufferings increased as time wore on. We thank the great Spirit for taking him into a heavenly world. There is but a veil between these worlds and he can abide with loved ones gone before and commune with us on earth. There is no reason why we should mourn, for he is happy, joyous, and content. He lived a useful, beautiful life. Eloquence is not needed here to-day. The fact that so many persons assemble to pay a final mark of respect to him is more forceful than words from mortal tongues."

Other than this extraordinary sermon the Spiritualist funeral, one of the few conducted in Washington, was similar to those of other rituals.

C. P. Longley, husband of the woman preacher, sang "Just a Thin Veil Between Us." Mr. Longley is eighty-two years old, and possesses a strong, clear baritone voice.

Has Talk With Grant's Spirit.

Evangelist Eklund Startles Audience by Telling Queer Story.—Hears Voice in Tomb.—Dead Warrior President Happy, and Glad He Was a Christian.—Avows Belief in the Appearance of Spirits.

Avowing a belief that the spirits of the dead are sometimes allowed to appear to comfort the wounded and broken-hearted, Evangelist Eklund last night electrified his audience at the Riverview skating rink by declaring that while in Grant's tomb in Riverside Drive, New York, he had carried on a conversation with the spirit of the great warrior-president. Turning to Mr. Jacobson, his soloist, the preacher pointed him out as a witness to the strange occurrence. Mr. Jacobson nodded assent.

Standing with bared head in the beautiful marble tomb, the evangelist was, he said, mysteriously moved to ask a question of the great man whose body lay buried there. What followed is as described by him:

"General, are you happy in your present state?" was asked.

For a few moments there was an awesome stillness in the tomb. Then the evangelist and his singer experienced a strange feeling as of some unseen presence, and a clear, distinct voice replied:

"I am."

Almost overcome by emotion, the evangelist paused for a moment, then asked:

"Of which are you gladder now,—that you were president of the United State, or that you were a Christian?"

"That I was a Christian," replied the voice, quickly, and with more strength than before.

In speaking last night on "Heaven," Mr. Eklund said in part:

"Somewhere in that unlimited space in the ethereal regions, God has a heaven prepared for his redeemed people; I can easily believe it is a place with mansions and rooms and that we shall live there something like the way we live here, in body and spirit. But it is a far better place than the world we live in now, as there is no sin, sorrow or death, but, on the other hand, joy, peace and happiness with Christ, while the years of eternity roll. God in nature is great here, but it is only a shadow of what God has prepared for his people. Washington, Lincoln, McKinley are in heaven and I'm going there to meet them."

Speaking of Spiritualist, he said he did not believe in spiritual humbugmakers and triflers, "but I do believe that God in His infinite wisdom and mercy, through His spirit, does at times, to console his wounded and heart-broken people on earth, reveal, not only the spirit but the form of the departed."

As atheism, in nearly all its forms, deeply interests the Swedish people, and having had such a great advocate of mysticism as the learned scholar, Swendenborg, of whom it is said, "Could his doctrines of correspondence be verified, our means of insight into the character of God would be largely extended," it is readily understood that the sermon was highly appreciated.

The evangelist's views on death are clearly put forth in Longfellow's words:

"There is no death; what seems so is transition;
This life of mortal breath
Is but a suburb of the life elysian,
Whose portal we call death."

Many a father's and mother's heart was made glad when he spoke of their meeting with the little girls and boys who had gone to the home beyond. His story of the little girl who had died at two years of age and came back to the world in spirit form and revealed herself to her father as a beautiful maiden recalled Longfellow's words from his poem, "Resignation:"

"Not as a child shall we again behold her;
For when with raptures wild
In our embraces we again enfold her,
She will not be a child.

"But a fair maiden in her Father's mansion,
Clothed with celestial grace;
And beautiful with all the soul's expansion
Shall we behold her face."

"No more revival services in heaven," said Mr. Eklund; "there's where I lose my job."

The invitation to prepare for this beautiful home of glory was accepted by quite a number. The Rev. A. F. Thornblom, of the First Swedish Congregational church of Pittsburg, took part in the services.

There will be a meeting conducted entirely in the English tongue for ladies at the rink to-morrow at 2 p.m., when the evangelist will give a lecture over the topic, "The Big Four to Hell." All ladies, and especially the English, are cordially invited. There will be a meeting to-night at 7:30, when Mr. Eklund will speak and Mr. Jacobson will delight the audience with song. The orchestra and choir will take part. All are invited.—Evening News, McKeesport, Pa.

ATTACKS RELIGIOUS HISTORY.

Prof. Wenley Says Discrepancies Fill the New Testament.—Disputes Jesus' Biography.—Effect on Christianity Discussed in the Episcopal Congress.

Fear of the result of an investigation of the historical originality of the Christian religion was the basis of a paper read May 14 by Prof. R. M. Wenley, of the University of Michigan, before the Episcopal congress of Detroit, Mich.

"Your knowledge of the historical Jesus is most fragmentary," he said. "This New Testament teems with discrepancies. The truths of Christianity do not seem to be peculiar to it. Similar teachings are found in other and older religions.

Christian History Misleading.

"The history of the Christian faith is misleading. In fact, we know very little, indeed, either of the authors of Jesus or the New Testament.

"The material for a biography of Jesus do not exist. My own conviction is that the negative process of historical research is destined to travel even farther, and it may be when criticism comes to clarify the evidence and to reconstruct the situation from an 'exact' historical standpoint, we shall stand aghast, stricken and helpless.

"The operation of the historico-critical method has made a vast change in the perspective in which we must set primitive Christianity. One good of this movement, however, has been to make the Bible a familiar book again. Yet, on the whole, its consequences count heavily on the negative side and bear hardly on natural piety.

VALUABLE ASSISTANTS FROM THE SPIRIT REALMS.

They Assist a Lady in Removing a Large Number of Books.

To the Editor: All this recent expose of fraudulent material manifestations in the ranks of Spiritualism, affecting those who have stood for years as accepted realities, causes the very pertinent question to arise, as to why the sincere seeker at this late date should take the risk of being deceived by those who have financial ends to serve, when one might almost safely declare that there is not a family in America where the facts could not be demonstrated, and all chance of fraud absolutely eliminated.

I do not stop at my belief in the family circle to demonstrate physical phenomena, but believe almost without exception the same can be demonstrated to the individual who seeks the truth with singleness of purpose, because to him the question is a vital one. Something like twenty-five years ago the question, "Is materialization a fact in nature," appealed to me with persistency that would not be silenced. I was an earnest, sincere and ever hopeful seeker, and for this very reason I met with many bitter experiences, for without myself understanding in the least the faculties of clairvoyance or clairaudience, I nevertheless possessed both. Cabinets had neither curtains or doors for me. I witnessed things that seemed to me strange and weird and frightfully wicked. Again and yet again I went forth on tours of investigation, only to return dumb with the heart-break of bitter disappointment. At last I reached the conclusion that this was the shadow side of Spiritualism, and I decided henceforth to keep in the light of the more spiritual side, believing that in time the light would grow strong enough to cast out the shadow entirely. Probably a year or more passed. I silently adhered to my conviction concerning materialization and all classes of physical phenomena, when an event occurred that completely upset my theories, and brought a lasting knowledge of the reality of materialization. At the time I occupied a large, old-fashioned residence in a Western city. It had often been vaguely hinted that the house was haunted. This did not in the least concern me in any manner, save the reduction in rent. At the period of which I am writing I had been alone in the house for several weeks. I had occasion during the last week to remove a collection of several hundred books from the top floor to the basement. There were two long flights of stairs and three long hallways. The two halls of the lower floors were gloomy, and the last flight of stairs almost dark. My method of transferring the books was in two good-sized market baskets. I made one trip, and then I realized that I had underrated a task greater than my strength could endure. As I descended to the first of the two lower halls on my second trip, I suddenly felt a hand on either side grasp the handles of the baskets, and the weight was entirely lifted from my hands. I was so frightened that I dropped the basket. After a few moments I recovered from my nervous shock and picked up the baskets. I no sooner laid hold of the handles than the weight was again lifted by big, strong hands that crowded mine, but as yet invisible. I proceeded on my way merely holding on to the handles of the baskets, and trying to keep pace with the rapid movements of my invisible helpers. When only a few steps down the last and almost dark hall, my helpers became distinctly visible, and the touch of their hands felt quite more real. To all appearances and touch they were real, live red men of the forest, clad in their deerskin. My helpers did not leave me until the last book had been deposited in the basement. I was absolutely alone in the house, therefore all chance of deception was out of the question.

Since that time I have witnessed almost every phase of physical phenomena when entirely alone, and these manifestations are always spontaneous, and absolutely unexpected. I am the last person in the world to be selected as a mediumistic type.

I recall a rather amusing incident of physical phenomena; this occurred some ten or more years ago in Brooklyn, N. Y. I had an intimate friend, a young lady, a professional nurse, who was very much afraid of all kinds of manifestations. She was mediumistic, but did all she could to cast off the consciousness of the presence of the invisible hosts. This seemed to rather amuse the spirits. This friend called one Sunday afternoon. There was a gentleman caller, and I had been sitting by a large oak library table. My young lady friend, being very much at home, started into the back parlor to lay off her wraps, the gentleman and I still sitting by the table (I was at the time an invalid). Suddenly the table gave a lurch in the direction of my young friend, and then trotted after her. Hearing the noise she turned, and with a screech began running around the room, the table awkwardly galloping after her.

On another occasion there were three persons present, a husband and wife and myself. We were discussing table rappings and experimenting with a small three-legged bamboo table, and receiving quite distinct raps. The husband was very skeptical and felt perfectly sure that we were doing the rapping ourselves (his wife and I). He told us if we would sit across the room against the wall, and he on the opposite side, leaving the table in the middle of the room, he would show us whether outside influences were manipulating the table. We complied with his request. He, in a spirit of fun, began singing, "Hot Time in the Old Town." The little table vibrated for a moment, then raised two legs and marched across the room to the music, keeping perfect time as long as the song lasted, which was brief, for before the table reached the man, he felt a sudden conviction that the presence animating it was that of his brother, whom I believe died at San Juan.

I firmly believe that almost any seeker after truth for the truth's sake can and will receive demonstrations, thoroughly convincing, without the shadow of possibility of fraud; but alas! how few seek to know the powers of the unseen realm without hope of some material gain.

A MISTAKE CORRECTED.

None are perfect; and all honorable men making mistakes delight to have them, in a fraternal spirit, corrected.

In The Progressive Thinker of May 2 a writer commences a paragraph with these words: "Celsus, one of the Christian fathers, insisted that it made no difference," etc., etc. Positively there was no apostolical or Christian Father by the name of Celsus. Listen. Lippincott's Biography and Mythology, page 594, says in substance: "Celsus, an Epicurean philosopher of the second century, the friend of Lucian. Both of these were noted for attacks upon Christianity."

Dr. Lamson (Unitarian), author and historian of "The Church in the First Three Centuries," writes, page 144: "Celsus, learned, witty master of the art of ridicule, was the Voltaire of his time. The Christian Father Origen replied extensively to his attacks upon Christianity," etc.

The erudite Dr. Hurst states that Porphyry, Hierocles and Celsus, the latter living about 150 A. D., were the strongest assailants of Christianity"—all of which is pretty solid testimony against the statement in The Progressive Thinker that "Celsus was a Christian Father."

This may be registered as a certainty: The writings of Spiritualists will be criticised keenly, mercilessly during the next quarter of a century. One of the sharpest, most pungent criticisms that I ever read was written by a Krishnaite Hindu in a Hindu Monthly Magazine, commenting upon Kersey Graves' book entitled "Sixteen Crucified Saviors." This Hindu critic, Harivijava, said that there was not an intelligent Hindu in the world who believed in the crucifixion of Krishna (pronounced "Kreeshna"), and of whom it is reported he had sixteen thousand wives, each of whom bore ten sons and one daughter; and when they grew up, Krishna performed their marriages. Also that he engaged in a number of battles, and finally was wounded while running to escape pursuing warriors, dying at the foot of a tree. This Hindu scholar referred me to three different lives of Krishna, written by Hindus, besides a sketch of his life in the Puranas.

DEATH IS SWEET.

Oh, Death is sweet, we oft are told,
There is pleasure dear in dying,
If this be true, then can we not
On belief like that relying,
Become quite fearless of the time
When mortal breath shall leave us,
And loving friends in spirit forms
Are ready to receive us?

How hard, when in the midst of life,
Surrounded by the pleasures
Of fortunate and friendly times,
And all these worldly treasures,
How hard to leave them one and all,
When life is worth the living,
Each new success and joy on earth
A new contentment giving.

And yet, when thoughts grow deeper still,
And reach a plane more splendid,
And see the good in spirit life,
The worry soon is ended.
A sweeter, dearer world than this,
Devoid of care and worry,
A world without this toil and strife,
And everlasting hurry.

This thought, this truth, can it not change
That dreadful thought of leaving,
And alter all those dark ideas
That lead to wrong believing?
Just think—think deeply of these things—
I'm sure 'tis worth the trying
To make our hearts find truth in this:
"There's pleasure dear in dying."

There is in spring a sort of mental unrest, parallel with the impulse at work in nature. I always think there is something in me which I have not yet discovered. It leaves me to rest. Is it a thought? Is it a feeling? Is it a word? A deed? I know not. But I feel as if I wanted to give vent to something.—Auerbach.

Highly Interesting and Suggestive.

In the following Translation from the French, by Mrs. Tattersfield, the Spiritualists everywhere have something to think about—something, possibly, that may startle them, in consequence of its departure from ordinary lines of thought in connection with mediumship, Spirit Return and the Spirit World. The Progressive Thinker is educational all along the Kaleidoscopic lines of Spirit Return. You can not keep posted without reading it.

WITH RESPECT TO HYPNOTISM AND SPIRIT CONTROL BY RUFINA NOEGGERATH, AUTHOR OF SURVIE.

Translated Especially for The Progressive Thinker from La Revue Spirite (Leopold Dauvil, Editor-in-Chief, Paris France), by Mrs. A. Monthon Tattersfield.

Hypnotism is the order of the day, books of all kinds abound on the subject and there is not a publication, psychic or scientific, that does not readily dwell upon the question.

That does not say that the treated subject is understood; nobody, so far, has given a rational explanation of the phenomenon, and as for our savants, they are not allowed to, because they deny themselves the right to rise above matter and will not admit, what they scornfully call, "The hypothesis of the intervention of spirits."

Spiritualism gives us the key to this mystery, but in order to thoroughly understand hypnotism it is indispensable to recollect a few precepts relating to incarnation and the physical constitution of man.

They are in brief:

Man is an immortal spirit enclosed in a perishable body; he has a soul, a psychic body, and a material body.

The soul is the spark coming from the Divine Hearth; the psychic body is the fluid covering of the soul, the body of flesh is the spirit's instrument of progress during successive incarnations; it is by means of the psychic body that the spirit acts on the material body; consequently there are two kinds of lives; the spiritual life, the fluid life of space, which we call invisible, and the corporal life, man's life on earth, which we call visible.

During the spiritual or physical life, the spirit manifests itself, perceives, acts, etc., by means of the psychic body, whose modes of perception, properties and faculties, if we compare them with those of the terrestrial, body, are extraordinary and unimaginable, and plunge us into the most profound admiration.

During the terrestrial life, the psychic body is intimately connected with the material body, whose modes of perception, qualities, etc., are adapted to this special life. The incarnate cannot manifest himself without this material covering; indeed as soon as it is abandoned, as is proved during calm sleep, trance, fainting or death, it becomes immediately inert, insensible and disaggregates.

This infers that each body in motion has a spirit to animate it. During the corporeal life the spiritual life is closed to the spirit, the law of incarnation granting neither reminiscence of previous existences, nor of this fluid life.

Therefore it is useless for man on earth, at the risk of injuring his body, to attempt to live for a few minutes the life of the Beyond; his efforts will not amount to anything, seeing that on his awakening he is not able to remember what he may have seen.

But the Great Universal Soul, in prescribing successive incarnations to the simple, ignorant spirit, so that the latter may climb the ladder of progress and learn to evolve to the upper worlds, has taken away from him the memory of past lives, so that he might not be constrained in his new and transient condition of life, nor troubled by remorse of previous faults.

He has shut himself off from heaven, but as a set-off, he willed in His justice that a friend of space, a spirit, a SECOND SELF should come to dispel the darkness of the material world, and to point out the road he ought to take, and to remind him of the splendors of a spiritual and real life!

This friend, who is "THE SCOUT," we call the "Watching Spirit;" it is he who superintends our incarnation; it is through his intervening that the being who is going to incarnate takes possession of the fertilized egg that soon shall become his prison of flesh; it is he who directs this coming into matter and superintends the adaptation of the psychic body TO THIS WONDERFUL EVOLVING MACHINE—THE HUMAN BODY. And when the spirit passes into the life of space and loses all recollection of the past, it is he who in the brain of the newborn, registers the resultant and acquisition of preceding incarnations.

Man has near him a being similar to himself, who is his reflex, but invisible to all eyes, for he is in the domain of spirits; it is this Scout who transmits the light to his second self, and who teaches him the principles of divine intelligence; if the human being has evolved, this Scout has done the same; he is part of himself; he never leaves; he is the transmitter of the grand divine laws that are brought to him; he is the "I Am" beyond the grave; he alone can speak of what constitutes the spiritual life, but still keeps within limits assigned him by superior laws, for he cannot reveal more than what is permitted.

Man has his free will; that is, he can ACT AS HE LIKES, but often when he errs or leaves the right road the Watcher's voice sounds in his ear, endeavoring to save him from temptations of the matter or solicitations of bad spirits; this voice from the conscience is his; and later on, when the incarnate's task is finished and the hour of deliverance from earthly chains has sounded, it is he again who superintends his disincarnation, assists him out of the trouble, and on his awakening wishes him welcome to the new-found life of space.

The mission of the Watching Spirits is to take care of the world and prevent its going to ruin; it is thus that "The Nameless One" has instituted the law of brotherhood and joint liability that bind the invisible with the visible, and unite the living with the dead; this law ought, then, to be the law of man, and when Jesus in a sublime incarnation came to say, "Love our Father above all things and your neighbor as yourself," and again, "Call of me and I shall come," he has given the wonderful synthesis of perfect knowledge of the universal laws.

Mediumship is, then, properly speaking, only the Watcher's positive influence on the incarnate; it depends, then, absolutely on the subtlety of the latter; it is not then the medium that wills. But the Scout cannot transgress the natural laws and make of his incarnate what he would like; the two spirits have each their own mission; one is the transmitter of fluid laws, the other the executor of earth's laws; the Watcher sets the cerebral movements of his incarnate in motion,—conscience, intellect, genius, etc.; the incarnate has all the elements of earth against him, and these are re-acted against by the Watcher.

We also know that manifold forms can be clothed by means of mediumship according to the medium's facility to communicate with his Scout. In the conscious, waking state he is seer, clairaudient, inspired, etc., and reports what the latter has made him see, hear and say; asleep, the management of the brain is left to the Scout, who speaks for him and serves him as a necessary medium in case of incorporation with other spirits, and directs the manipulation of material elements necessary for the production of phenomena. We know, for a fact, that the spirit, though enclosed in matter, can nevertheless leave the body momentarily while staying attached to it by a fluid band; this is the phenomenon of sleep or exteriorization. This parti-color state can be produced by different causes. Sometimes the spirit, having exhausted his store of fluids, goes into space to acquire renewed strength, to fetch new forces so that he can bring his instrument of evolution into action; this is natural sleep; sometimes he makes his escape voluntarily, without restraint, on the solicitation of his Watcher and this is mediumistic sleep; sometimes he is pursued and prevented to act by certain substances, if he makes a practice of them, such as opium, narcotics, alcohol, etc., which paralyze his body, putting it into a peculiar state of crispation; if this shrivelling up becomes too intense and lasts too long, death follows, caused by rupture of the fluid band, and this is provoked by sleep. Joy, fear, pain and anger are equally causes of weakness, syncope or disincarnation, etc., etc.; finally when the spirit sleeps and finds himself under the sway of a will but his own, he is in a magnetic sleep, another kind of provoked sleep.

During all these different kinds of sleep the exteriorized spirit finds himself near his Watcher; then he remains with him at the side of his body, or indeed, if he has already evolved and circumstances permit, he penetrates under his guide, into the invisible world, ready to return on the slightest alarm. He has a sense of this alarm by a shock to the fluid band that connects him with his material covering. It is most dangerous to awake a person in a deep sleep abruptly.

The spirit does not remember anything on his awakening, unless his Watcher allows him to live over again, in the form of vision, the few moments he passed in the other world.

This granted, how is the hypnotic phenomenon produced? When the hypnotizer or magnetizer operates he calls to his aid, in spite of his Watcher, by effort of his will, dominating spirits, whose fluids repel the vital fluids of the incarnate, compelling him to leave his body and to put himself under the magnetizer's absolute control; these dominating spirits, as a result from former incarnations, have a band to unite them with the magnetizer.

In speaking of "hypnotism," then, we mean "dominion;" thus we find ourselves in the presence of dominator and dominated, and we shall easily understand the reason why this practice is strictly condemned by the "Great in Space," HYPNOTISM BEING CONTRARY TO THE LAW OF LIBERTY.

Magnetizers can act only upon weak, excitable beings of an overwrought nervous system, void of will-power, as in the case of sufferers from hysteria; powerful hypnotizers are scarce, but subjects are more so. The incarnate who surrenders his will power, leaves his body and allows himself to be dominated by another person, as well as giving up his organism, evidently puts his Watcher in a difficult position; the latter is justly charged with the keeping of this brain that he, so inconsiderately, lent to another. Who knows, if this other may not by ignorance, stupidity or spitefulness PUT THE MACHINE OUT OF ORDER?

What will, then, the Watcher do? Because the incarnate no longer can manifest himself, he tries to replace the absent one; he answers questions in his place, of course, if it is possible, for he cannot go beyond the comprehension of the incarnate, nor violate universal laws; no will power can compel him to speak things from the invisible; he particularly tries to repel the influence of the magnetizer's domineering spirits that surround him, and according to the fluid laws, administered to the spirits, he is urged and sometimes compelled to let them take momentarily possession of the subject. Generally these incorporations are the echo of the experimentalist's own thoughts. It can also happen that in consequence of a moment's inattention or lack of will power on the part of the hypnotizer, other spirits than his own incorporate with the sleeping subject; these spirits nearly always are rebellious, resist the hypnotizer and sometimes even try to do him harm. Because of this, the latter suddenly finds himself troubled, ill at ease, exhausted and wishes to close the seance, but he finds great difficulty in awakening his subject, and will not succeed in doing so before the incorporated, who no longer can keep his place, is positively repulsed by the Watcher, who all the time is making the greatest efforts to make the incarnate re-enter his body. This power to reinstate the spirit to his prison of flesh belongs to the Watcher alone.

As for the subject, he generally comes out of these experiences with CEREBRAL DISORDER, COMPROMISED OR RUINED HEALTH OR MAD.

From the preceding, it is easy to understand that the dominator can suggest to the dominated what he thinks fit, and moreover should his subject be accustomed to be put to sleep by him, he can act upon him from a distance by the intervention of his spirits. But it may happen as a set-off that the Watcher of the subject, with the aid of friends from the Beyond, shall discard the magnetizer's dominion, reject his fluids, and obey no longer; and however docile the subject may have been, it now become refractory.

In most cases no serious results can be obtained by the way of hypnotism; the subject assailed by elementary spirits, against which the Watcher never ceases to react, is absolutely shut off from the advanced spirits, and consequently these proceedings ought then to be absolutely condemned by every conscientious searcher; they are CONTRARY TO THE LAW OF LIBERTY, DESTRUCTIVE TO THE HEALTH OF THE SUBJECT, AND LEAD NOWHERE.

But savants and experimentalists who hypnotize, what do they want?

Information about acts of controlling?

In that case they are deceived, because the Watcher of the subject cannot reach further than a certain limit, and is not admitted beyond that limit. Besides, the results thus obtained are so impregnated with the thoughts of the operator, that the latter openly calls them "suggestions."

Nevertheless it has happened that secrets and confessions have been forced from certain persons, criminals, for instance, by this means; but such cases are quite exceptional, and cannot be generalized, for in the first place, in order to produce them, these persons must have been easily hypnotized, and minus will power, which is very uncommon with a malefactor or any one who is not disposed to tell what he knows; in the second place, the Watcher may have been authorized to make such revelations, as he could not disclose what the incarnate seemed to hide so well; if not, the latter, overwhelmed by remorse or from some other reason, has made a formal resolution to confess all. The Watcher is constantly pointing out to the culprit his bad actions in order to incite him to repentance and to redeem his fault, but he is obliged to respect the liberty of one whose guardian he is, and consequently he cannot betray him.

Why, then, hypnotize?

I do not think it is but to show to the astonished ignoramuses that, by means of will power, one being may have dominion over another, providing the latter surrenders himself, full of confidence, and to prove that anything whatsoever can be suggested to him?

In any case these experience prove indisputably, that the will of one being can be substituted by that of another; all our savants agree upon that point.

And what is the manifested will, if not an act of spirit power?

Under these circumstances, when our mediums at our Spiritualistic seances, of their own free will, without intervention from those present, fall into a trance, are plunged into mediumistic sleep, producing wonderful phenomena, we are obliged to attribute these manifestations to somebody else's WILL POWER, NOT OUR OWN, because we are passive; if there are other expressions of will than ours, the manifested will being the property of spirit power, then there must be spirits! * * *. On the other hand, because the subject is a terrestrial subject, and as he is only permitted to received the echoes transmitted to him, it is evident that from an experimental point of view, it is preferable and more interesting to take a subject under mediumistic influence; that is, under the influence of fluids other than those of the experimentalist, in order that the body of the medium may be in a catalepsy,—otherwise said to be freed from the fluids of his incarnate—and to have submitted to this influence, there must have been other spirits than those of the earth near the subject, who have repelled the vital fluids of the incarnate, so as to take possession themselves, or make place for some of their own. But these spirits of the space, being in full possession of their spiritual forces, they can enter the medium without restraint answer set questions, interpret their principles, give information and produce phenomena; this they could not do with a hypnotized subject.

As for the medium, he has nothing to fear for his health, the mediumistic sleep being absolutely without danger. The spirits take care of him, and at the close of the seance he is left with healing fluids in his organism.

Therefore, our teachers always forbid us to hypnotize or magnetize any medium, our terrestrial fluids not being able to harmonize with those of advanced spirits, are repelled.

The conditions of success of every seance depends solely upon the experimentalist's passivity, patience and LOVE FOR THE GOOD.

Therefore never, then, touch a medium for whatever cause, neither before, during, nor after a seance. Before the seance you would hinder the spirits' preparatory work; during the seance, you would chase away the advanced spirits, and after you would make the medium lose the benefit of the healing fluids left by the spirits.

If the medium is in a profound trance, or a long time in regaining his senses, do not act upon him by means of magnetic passes! You would do him the greatest injury by paralyzing the action of his Watcher. Have no fear, the spirits know better than we do what suit us; they certainly know how to awake those they have put to sleep.

HOW ABOUT THE LAMBS?

What Do We Owe the Workers of of the Future?

Casting an observant eye over the past and present work in the Spiritualistic field, and noting well the steady onward march of progressive workers, also the readiness with which at present our teachings take root, there rises in the mind the question: "Is it not high time to stake our claim in wider dimension? In other words, Is it not our ardent duty to work with sharper outlook into the future?

The present is always too ready to wrap us in sweet oblivion, and partly deafen our ears to the commanding voice of progress. "Feed thy children what thou deemest the best fruit upon the tree of wisdom."

We have arrived at a point from which, in sharp angle, our path is turning into a different direction. Spiritualism of the present must become wider awake. Will it sweep out of its path the obstacles which hinder its unfolding into a savior from old belief?

We were and are all busy gathering sheep into the fold, but how about the lambs? Should not they call our keenest attention as to their spiritual welfare? How much are we doing at present for our future workers in the field of Spiritualism? Industriously, orthodoxy everywhere is gathering in the children; the Spiritualists as well, hugging them as close to its bosom as possible.

Orthodoxy knows well where its strength rests. Young minds, trained in a proper way, are fortifications of unlimited strength. May the inner fort be crumbling with decay, the outer protecting new ones will shield it for a long time yet, from entire collapse.

We have nimbly carried much of orthodoxy's theatrical finery into our stronghold and adorned its walls therewith, why not also copy its stratagem in the way of taking care of the spiritual unfoldment of the young? Here we stand blowing the horn of Reform in spiritual belief, for getting to make our offspring herald the glad tidings also, in their own small way by our side.

Great is the labor of the few trying to bring about a recognition of the fruitage, won on the Lyceum field! But what does their hard work amount to, if not every Spiritualist make it his business to foster with all his might the laborious work of the comparatively few far-seeing ones? We must come out of the old rut, and speedily; time demands it.

SPIRITUALISM HAS A FUTURE IF WE MAKE ONE!

Let us not be hugging the flimsy apprehension that Spiritualism is gaining headway, if we hang out no HEADLIGHTS. We need them, and in plenty. Our road is not devoid of chasms; let us take care to bridge them, or the future Spiritualists might take a tumble; to the immense delight of our relentless foe, the church. What we have gained by way of consistency and patience, is really not bulwark for future days, if we neglect to raise properly a new army of defenders of our beloved cause. Spiritualism of to-day is not any more the Spiritualism of thirty and more years ago. Waves of enthusiasm surged high at that time. They came from the very souls of the interested, inspiring to ardency and endurance in the effort of gaining living proof of the basis of their teachings: "Phenomena of spirit return."

The first enthusiastic trumpeting of an astounding truth into the world has in time slackened down considerably, leaving us, the followers, almost of those heroes, cool-headed and collected; going about our works. Science has a meddling hand in our declaration; it is true that science will in due time help us prove to the world the genuineness whereupon we feel based, but science will not wake in our children that reverence, that deep seated inerrability, which our training can develop in them, for and in our philosophy, the crowning glory of our phenomena.

Science is devoid of sentiment, such as inner feelings press upon the mind of the spiritually inclined. Phenomena requires none, but that part of our scientific philosophical teaching, which has a religious bearing, does. Sentiment will always, and must, go hand in hand with feelings of reverence for the ruling power of the universe, no matter how much it is spurned by some, as not befitting the searcher for cause and effect.

Our children, if we want them to share and foster our belief in future, must be taken in hand early; as early as the church was wont to take care of our spiritual unfoldment.

He who piously hugs his Spiritualism and lets his children feed upon morsels falling from the tables of orthodoxy, or entire freedom from soul culture, IS NO SPIRITUALIST AT ALL! And he who stands aloof, cynically denouncing movement of unity and progress, rooted only in phenomena and remnants of dogmatism, has a long way to walk yet ere he ascends to the spiritual heights of real Spiritualism.

Catholicism has shown the world what UNITY CAN BRING ABOUT and persistency in training. Spiritualists should carefully take note of that fact, and waste no time "getting together" and fostering the recent undertaking of the N. S. A. in urging and helping to erect for our children Lyceums all through the land wherein they will be taught how to become "genuine Spiritualists and fruitful workers of the future."

With the help of the Lyceum lessons, freely and generously given room in The Progressive Thinker, every home where children are can be made a Lyceum, if need be. "Where there is a will, there is a way," the old saying is; if we earnestly strive for a thing, we will attain the qualities necessary to bring about realization.

Would that my earnest plea for a general sprouting up of Lyceums, awakened some of our old and tried warriors of the Cause, to action, and their pen, more skilled than mine, take up the cry: We owe the future workers for the Cause of Spiritualism a proper training! and pursue it until all Spiritualists bestir themselves to join in, and feel duty bound to become hod-carriers at the erection of the grand temple that shall represent Spiritualism in the future.

AUSTRALIA NOTES.

Lole F. Prior Writes from Brisbane, Queensland.

Only a few words of greeting from this far-off land, which I hope will prove of interest to the many readers of The Progressive Thinker, showing how "Truth" is spreading in this part of the world.

Since my last letter I have closed my engagement in Sydney, N. S. W., which covered a period of two months, comprising two lectures each Sunday, and two mid-weekly meetings, one of which was hel at Burwood, N. S. W. My stay in Sydney was a pleasant one, and I shall recall with deep feelings of thankfulness, the weeks that were spent in New South Wales, and the warm-hearted folk who were my host and hostess, Mr. Geo. W. Nettleton and his wife, and the many staunch supporters that contributed so much to making the meetings the great success they were. In this connection I must mention one of "God's mediums," Miss S. E. Lester, a saintly woman, who is a "Divine Scientist," but who has grasped the truths in Spiritualism! What a wonderful woman! At the age of eighty, she has the clear mind, brave heart, and cheerful smile of early youth; while her physical activity is that of one who has not yet reached the age of thirty. Her's is the elixir of life; for she has learned to appropriate God! It is to her generous spirit I owe thanks, for she, by sending me a check for £15 ($75) enabled me to rent one of the best halls in Sydney for the Sunday evening meetings. While there are four organized societies in said city, they do not conduct evening meetings, only as each medium has a circle in his or her own home, while the lectures are given in the afternoon.

In one sense Spiritualism is not upon a very high plane there, because there are but few teachers, and only a handful of workers who are willing to aid the teachers. The old "Psychic Society," that had existed for years, is of the past, and out of it has been born "The Spiritual Church of N. S. W.," the "Church of Seers," "The Church of Spiritual Philosophy," and "Mrs. Schutz and Mr. McLeod Craig's Meetings." There is a little too much "personality" and not enough "principle" taught; but I hope the future will correct all that. I left Sydney on April 3, and traveled by rail northward over 600 miles, to Brisbane. The journey, while hot and dusty, was nevertheless enjoyed; for I was passing through a wonderful bit of country, which is somewhat mountainous. The train would dart in and out of tunnels, thunder over bridges, swing across the "Darling (river) Downs," opening up a perfect panorama for eyes to behold! Greens, browns and reds, what a beautiful dress nature has put on after the rains, which have recently visited the state! Ah, God's paint brush has been at work, and if we only grasp the beauty of the canvas presented to our view, we must say, "This world is a grand place to live in!"

I left Sydney on Friday at 5 p. m., reached Brisbane at 9:30 at night on Saturday, somewhat tired, but ready the next day for my work. The first lecture was given in the opera house to a packed house, and was warmly received. My stay here is three weeks, when I go still further north to "Charters Towers," the leading mining center of this part of the world, and over 700 miles from Brisbane; in my next letter I will tell you about "The Towers."

Brisbane (Queensland) is the capital of the state, which is the second largest of the commonwealth, and one of the richest, for here are to be found gold, copper, and tin, great mineral wealth, while opal and other gems are also mined. Then the Darling Downs are noted for grazing ground, for vast herds of horses and cattle, and flocks of sheep. The only drawback is, Queensland cannot always depend upon getting rain enough, but this has been a splendid year.

The capital city was a convict colony, and was settled about 1825. It makes one's heart ache to listen to the stories of horror told of those past times, how cruelly the convicts were treated, and how many times they escaped from one horror, only to be the victim of another; for if they escaped from their tormenter, the jailor, they were flogged for the least offense, they either died in the bush from the bite of snakes, or were captured by the natives who are cannibalistic, and were the main feature at the feast. 'Tis well not to think of those times.

I am the guest of Mr. Thurlby, who is the president of the society here, and have been made most welcome. There are two societies in Brisbane, and both doing very good work, which I will report in my next letter, as I do not wish to occupy too much of your valuable paper.

Regain Your Eyesight

A Remarkably Successful Home Treatment That Seldom Fails.

Costs Less Than a Single Fee of a First Class Specialist.

Cold printed words cannot describe the wonderful merits of the "Actina," treatment for all forms of eye troubles. You must see it, examine it, and use it for a time before you can form a just opinion of its true value.

We can supply you with all the evidence the most skeptical person could exact that the "Actina" treatment has and does remove cataracts, granulations, and most all other causes of eye disfigurement and impaired eye sight. We can also show you plenty of evidence from former patients that the "Actina" treatment has cured many stubborn eye diseases of ten to fifteen years standing, even after prominent specialists had pronounced them as being incurable.

Besides all this evidence we will gladly send you our treatment, with full directions, which you can thoroughly test for two weeks. If at the end of that time you do not feel that you have been benefited, or if for any other reason you do not wish to take the treatment longer, send it back and no charge will be made.

The "Actina" treatment is so simple and so logical in construction and application that it at once appeals to the common-sense mind, as well as to the scientific. There is no cutting nor drugging—simply apply to the afflicted parts and the scientifically produced vapor currents will relieve the congestion, perfect the circulation, so that Nature may cure the disease. Not only will the one "Actina" appliance remove the cause of trouble, but it will strengthen the eyes so that spectacles may be entirely abandoned in many instances. One instrument can be used by the entire family and will last for years.

The germ-destroying and health-producing vapors generated in the "Actina" will penetrate the innermost organs of the head; therefore, as a relief for catarrh, hay fever, bronchitis, deafness and all other ailments produced by cold and catarrhal deposits "Actina" has no equal.

Permit us to send you a copy of our 64-page book, which illustrates and describes the cause and relief of diseases of the eye, ear, nose, throat and head. It will interest you and is fully worth the postal card that will bring it. Address Actina Appliance Co., Dept. 3422, 811 Walnut St., Kansas City, Mo.

Correspondent writes: "The closing monthly meeting of the Chicago Spiritualists' League, held on Saturday afternon and evening, May 9, was well attended by a very enthusiastic audience. The afternoon program began by the introduction of the Lyceum subject, opened by Dr. T. Wilkins, followed by Dr. Burgess, Mrs. Kirchner, Mrs. Nora Hill, Mrs. A. W. Bloom, and a committee of ladies, Mrs. Kirchner from the south side, Mrs. Hill from the west side and Mrs. Bloom from the north side, were appointed by President Wilkins, each to select their own aids, which they did, and 23 children were enrolled. But as the heated season is upon us now, it was thought best to give the Spiritualists children a ride to Elgin, Sunday, June 21, as a starter toward getting them together, and following this up with other picnics during the summer months. It was the unanimous sentiment of the meeting to carry this out, and it does begin to look as though the Lyceum work was to be taken up with a vim."

The last monthly meeting of the Chicago Spiritualist League, held on Saturday, May 9, was well attended by an enthusiastic audience and the program in the afternoon from 3 to 5, consisted of music by the Richards Orchestra, invocation by Mrs. Nora E. Hill; paper by Mr. A. M. Griffen, read by G. H. Sidwell, secretary; recitation by Mrs. Bird; addresses by Dr. T. Wilkins, Dr. C. A. Burgess, Mrs. A. W. Bloom, Mr. S. B. West, of Elgin, Mrs. Henrietta Lichtig, Mrs. Hilbert, Mrs. Susie Thompson, and the messages were given by Mrs. Vaughn, Mr. Sidwell, Mrs. Wilson, and others. Then came lunch and coffee time, a rest, a visit, and the evening service. Again some beautiful music by the Richards Orchestra, an eloquent and logical address by Mr. H. F. Arnold. The duets by Mr. Arthur Hooper and Miss Ludwina Lunzen, were really the finest renditions of the season, and called for an encore, as did the beaulful piano solo by Carl Richards. Dr. Wilkins read a poem, Mr. Harry Burgess delivered an eloquent address on the Indian aand his religion, and compared it with the Christian religion of the past and the present. Mrs. Theresa Loll, and Mrs. Isa Cleveland were the message bearers, and right well did they do their work, and the audience seemed thoroughly satisfied with each of them. The League Executive Board will hold their regular sessions for the transaction of business through the summer season, at regularly announced times.

Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, Secretary Morris Pratt Institute Association, will attend the annual meeting of that body, to be held in the Institute at Whitewater, Thursday, May 21st.

Frances Spalding writes: "We closed our engagement with the Temple Fund Society of Cleveland, O., Sunday, April 26, serving that society, both March and April. Mrs. Elizabeth Grey, president; Mrs. Hattie Prindle, treasurer; Mrs. Carl Sollinger, secretary; with other efficient workers, are earnestly looking after the Cause of Spiritualism in that city. We shall serve the First Society of Hamilton, Ontario, May, June and July, and then to Lily Dale for a short vacation and rest."

Oscar A. Edgerly writes from 181 Newbury Street, Boston, Mass.: "On Sunday, May 3rd., I began the second month of my two months' engagement at the First Spiritual Temple (Ayer's Temple), Boston, Mass. In occupying the rostrum of this temple I find ideal conditions supplied for a trance speaker. The environment furnished by the beautiful auditorium, coupled with the lovely singing of Mrs M. S. Ayer, accompanied by the music of the magnificent pipe organ, is indeed soul-inspiring. Mediums often fail to find sympathy when it is most needed. But when one occupies a rostrum where Mr. M. S. Ayer presides, there comes that feeling of perfect content which best supplies the conditions which make it possible for the spirit inspirers to do their best work. In my opinion the time will come when the Spiritualists of the whole world will appreciate what Mr. Ayer has done and is doing for our cause. Those who come in personal contact with him can best appreciate the man, and the work he is doing. During June I shall fill engagements at Unity Camp-meeting, Mass., and at Lake Brady camp meeting, Ohio. My permanent address is 42 Smith street, Lynn, Mass."

A cordial invitation is extended to all Spiritualists to attend a special test seance to be held on Thursday evening, May 21, at the Hyde Park Occult Society, 319 E. 55th street, near Monroe ave. Good mediums will be present and an enjoyable evening may be looked for.

Quite a large crowd assembled in Hyde Park Occult Society Hall on Sunday evening, May 10, to listen to the grand truths as they were expounded by Brother and Sister Kirchner, Sisters Lichtig, Hansen and Harper. The people of the Hyde Park district, knowing of the good talent that is always on the platform tell all their friends, thereby increasing the attendance more and more every Sunday. The messages were all recognized, and the spiritual uplift we all received from the remarks of Sisters Lichtig and Hansen were very gratifying. The society now has the assurance of good workers; thus we hope to increase our membership and spread the gospel of our glorious Cause.

BEAR IN MIND that the Editor of The Progressive Thinker is in no wise responsible for the views expressed by contributors. He may or may not, agree with their respective views.

TAKE NOTICE.—Correspondents are required when writing for this paper to use either a typewriter or a pen, with black ink. Write on one side of the paper only, and in a plain, legible hand, and thus avoid the necessity of preparing your copy for the printer. Please bear this in mind.

We desire to state that in the notice of last week, written by Mrs. Peet, regarding the election of officers of the Band of Harmony, the name of Mrs. Mary B. Hill as secretary was accidentally omitted, we regret to say, by the printer, NOT by Mrs. Peet, the corresponding secretary.

Mrs. Barbara Hilbert, pastor of the Progressive Spiritual Society, 183 E. North avenue, is greatly enthused with the prospect of having with her on the rostrum, Sundays, May 24 and 31, the eloquent young graduate of the Morris Pratt Institute, Miss Lina M. Schanbacher, and that little hall should be packed each Sunday.

Many of the meetings in the city are intending to close up for the months of June, July and August, to give the workers a chance to scent the fragrance of the summer air.

Dr. T. Wilkins, President of the Illinois State Spiritualists' Association, will attend the Commencement exercises at Whitewater on the 20th inst, and will make a report of the same for The Progressive Thinker. Of course the official report will come through the Secretary of the association.

Mrs. Ada M. Came writes from Cambridge, Mass.: "The Cambridge Spiritual Industrial Society held its regular meeting May 8. Mrs. Katie Ham was the speaker, and drew a large audience. The last meeting of the season will be May 22, when Mrs. Ham will again be the speaker. Supper at 6:30; evening meeting at 8 o'clock."

G. H. Sidwell writes as follows of The Second Spiritualists' Church, formerly The Church of the Psychic Forces: "It held its regular Sunday services at Wilcox Hall, 361, E. 43rd street, May 10. There was, as usual, a very harmonious gathering of Spiritualists and seekers into this grand truth. While we expected another medium to be with us beside our own pastor, Sister Isa Cleveland, and were somewhat disappointed in not having her present, our disappointment gave way to happiness when we listened to the grand messages given by our pastor, who, even suffering a gread deal of physical pain, has always stood ready and willing to show to those seeking the true light the way they should go. While a great many come to these meetings seeking advice that will help them materially, there are also those who show by the interest taken that they come to seek that which will help them to understand the truth of this grand and noble work, purely for the uplifting and betterment of humanity. We again had the pleasure of listening to another lecture by H. F. Arnold. Such lectures as it has been our privilege to listen to from this young and talented speaker have done much to redeem the cause of Spiritualism, and help us to have faith in the ultimate redemption of mankind. It is not necessary to state that this society has many energetic workers for Spiritualism in its ranks and is increasing in membership all the time. All are invited to help us in this grand cause."

Mrs. Bergere writes: "On April 22 the Fraternal Daughters elected officers as follows: President, Mrs. Caird; vice-president, Mrs. Blunt; recording secretary, Mrs. Bergere; financial secretary, Mrs. Adams; treasurer, Mrs. Schwartz; trustees, Mrs. Travis and Goldstein. Financ- secretary and treasurer's report as follows: From May 1, 1907, to May 1, 1908, receipts, $321. 78; disbursements, 293.11; balance on hand, $28.67. The Daughters are highly pleased with their year's work. The Daughters' Get-together Social on April 29 was a grand success in every way. Everyone enjoys these socials. The children, the young folks and the older ones took part in the exercises. Our next will be the last Wednesday, May 27. Come and have a good time with us, 406 Ogden avenue, corner Robey street, Atlas hall. The Daughters hold their meetings every Wednesday afternoon and evening in the same hall."

Rev. Sophia B. Selp, president O. S. S. Association, lecturer and platform test medium, desires a change. She will answer calls in any state, or at camps for a short or long period. Address her at No. 302 Alisky building, Portland, Ore.

E. W. Sprague writes of the Michigan State Convention: "It was one of the best conventions it has held in years; good work was done last year, and there is promise of still better work being done the coming year."

J. Madison Allen writes: "It is my intention to take the great field again for a long summer's work at least, leaving the numerous local duties and special lines in sole charge of Mrs. Allen, who is abundantly equipped, capacitated and devoted. I am hoping and expecting to be kept busy as the weeks and months go by; and would like to fill full as possible the route program. To that end I wish to call the special attention of societies, camps and committees, along the line of my proposed route: Eastward through Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, Pennsylvania, New York and New England) to the fact that my professional services can be secured for the summer or fall. Please let me hear from you promptly, with any particulars needful. You will be served from the standpoint of one who is in the work for its own sake, not for money alone. Address me at Decatur, Illinois, in care of Thos. S. Kiser, 531 N. Mercer street."

IN RE L. L. KINGSLEY.

A question has arisen as to the death of the man whose name heads this article. Can any Spiritualist resident in Minneapolis, Minnesota, or in Indianapolis, Indiana, positively state from personal knowledge that this man committed suicide Nov. 25, 1907, in Minneapolis? Some people assert that Kingsley is still on the face of the earth, playing his old time trade. He may be in Portland, Oregon. Any information will be thankfully received.

Very truly yours,
HARRISON D. BARRETT.

Rev. Marguerite St. Omer Briggs is convalescing from a severe attack of pneumonia and heart trouble.

Mrs. Maggie Vestal writes as follows from Wichita, Kansas, where she has been working for the First Spiritual Society: "I am now open for engagements, including camps and platform tests, through the trumpet in glaring gas light; the only light trumpet medium in the field. Address me at No. 139 North Lawrence, Wichita, Kans."

The twelfth annual convention of Montana State Spiritualists' Association will convene in Butte, June 4, 5, 6 and 7. The officers and members extend a cordial invitation to all Spiritualists of the state to be present and lend a helping hand to make the convention a success socially and financially. We will have good speakers and test mediums present, and look forward to a grand and glorious meeting. For further information write to Mrs. Eva McCoy, of Butte, Montana, or Mrs. W. C. Selbrede, secretary of M. S. S. A., Billings, Mont, 303 N. 27th street."

Mrs. Dr. Caird writes: "Do not forget that the Illinois Sunflower Club will hold a basket or box party at the residence of Mrs. J. R. Francis, 40 Loomis street, Saturday, May 23, at 7 o'clock. Every effort is being made by the committee to make this a most enjoyable affair. Remember, the lady bringing the finest basket or box of lunch will receive a prize, and rest assured that the members of the Club will make this occasion fully equal to any of their past efforts. Come and help us make this in every sense a success. The Club will hold its next tea party Tuesday, May 26. Good mediums will be in attendance. Mrs. Ella J. Bloom will preside at the urn."

LONGINGS.

Oh! had I the wings of a dove to fly far away and find rest, Far above the mountains high, and o'er the ocean's foamy crest;
For somewhere there is an island fair
where sorrow is unknown,
Where night is turned to lasting light,
'tis there my loved have flown.

But when and how to reach that land,
I ask?
Tell me ye birds, tell me ye flowers that bask
In the noonday sun, why must I wait so long,
Why tarry here when my heart's in the land of song?

Seared is my brow with care, heavy
my eyes with tears,
Weary my hands with toil, my heart fraught with fears;
Still the call cometh not; long have
I waited,—
Ah, lonely wanderer, surely thou 'rt fated.

Like a poor pilgrim, footsore and weary,
Wending his way through trackless
sands dreary,
Sees the dream city, radiant and shining,
Forgets that for water and food he is pining.

Thus I am gazing far, far away
Wearily waiting the dawn of the day,
Watching the gates of the dream city
white,
When those gates spring open, farewell to the night.

For there on the portals my dear ones will stand
To welcome me home to the dear summerland,
And my heart so long burdened at last will find rest
Safe there in the haven with those
I love best.

ALL SPIRITS IMMORTAL.

The Writer Believes That the Most Depraved Continue to Live Forever.

To the Editor: Charles Dawbarn, the Pacific Coast philosopher, predicts the total extinction of the Fiends of Darkness on the spirit side of life.

He says that certain spirits by declining to advance are on the road to extinction and to actual disintegration of his personality, which he says probably means that the real man within his form may have to begin mortal experiences all over again in another form of personality.

We beg leave to take exception to the idea of extinction. Once Abraham Lincoln, John Wilkes Booth or the worst criminal who ever lived, each and all maintain their personality. The greatest criminal inherits eternal life just as certainly as the most virtuous and best of men. We are born to inherit whether we desire it or not; it does not depend on the character of the person. The Christians declare that eternal life is obtainable only through Jesus Christ. Then on the contrary they declare the wicked will suffer eternally, although they may call on the rocks to hide them and the mountains to cover them, and desire extinction.

The only reliable information we can procure comes from the spirit world. We say reliable advisedly, because, although we receive some conflicting, or even contradictory statements from spirits through mediums, is not a good reason why very many statements coming through honest, truthful mediums should not receive full confidence. We believe they are entitled to it. They tell us that all life, whether of animal or vegetable, is continuous after so-called death; that it is indestructible; that life is spirit and that spirit is life, and that the spirit world consists of emanations from this planet which it surrounds.

People complain because they know so little about the spiritual world and its inhabitants. Very true, and it is equally true that we know very little about this life in comparison to what we don't know.

People on earth differ so much in their statements concerning the same subject, frequently contradicting each other, yet each may state what they believe as they see it from their point of observation; but we do not usually discredit all the different statements because they do not agree in every particular. Many people are more exacting in regard to spiritual statements. They expect all the communications to agree in every particular, or they are disposed to discredit all; in fact, some people make more of an effort to discover a little discrepancy than to discover the truth which may conflict with their preconceived ideas.

Surely communications coming from spirits who, while on earth, were distinguished for truthfulness, are as much entitled to our repsect and confidence as they were before going to the spirit world.

While we understand that death does not transform vicious people into angels of truth and purity, it is equally true that death does not transform honest, truthful people into deceivers and liars. "By their fruits we may know them." While we despise and bitterly denounce fraud as practiced by some in the name and guise of Spiritualism, we must not be discouraged in our search for truth concerning a future state of existence, because spirits who have passed over tell us that the knowledge they acquired concerning the spirit world before leaving this they found very much to their advantage. There is no excuse for people remaining in ignorance on this subject if they wish to be informed.

I would earnestly advise those who do not possess a copy of original Spiritual Letters from Franz Peterslia through his son, Carlyle Peterslia, to procure one, which they can almost do without money and without price; by subscribing for The Progressive Thinker you can get it as a premium. The book is full of the most interesting, and I believe absoluely reliable statements concerning spirit life, and I think is worth more than its weight in gold.

My advice is to pay more attention to information coming from the spirit world through good, honest, reliable mediums than to the guesses and conjectures of the most learned philosophers who have never been there. Have convictions of your own, and don't be afraid to stand by them.

A PERENNIAL MYTH.

Exploded by the Truth Seeker.

Our esteemed contemporary, The Progressive Thinker, unwittingly does Colonel Ingersoll an injustice by attributing to him a temperance lecture which he never made or claimed as his. Somebody took a paragraph of Ingersoll's and attached to it a paragraph by somebody else. On the strength of this piece of patchwork Ingersoll was accused of plagiarism. Not only that, but Christians allege the theological allusions in the added paragraph are proof that Colonel Ingersoll could on occasion appeal to God and the devil. "My Christian friends," writes a Missouri reader of The Truth Seeker, "take great pains to call my attention to the Colonel's use of these terms." We recommend that he submit to his Christian friends the pamphlet "Ingersoll As He Is" (price 25 cents), by the Editor of The Truth Seeker. Ingersoll offered to pay a thousand dollars to any one who could show that he ever pretended that he was the author of the God and devil part of the speech; that he ever uttered it, or wrote, or repeated it, or published it, or claimed it directly or indirectly as his own. The Editor of The Truth Seeker ten years ago induced the editor of the leading Methodist paper of the country to inform his readers as above, but the libel survives all attempts to kill it. When it gets into a newspaper read by Freethinkers the case looks hopeless. What Colonel Ingersoll actually said (The Progressive Thinker's version seems to be taken from somebody's defective memory), is this:

"I believe, gentlemen, that alcohol, to a certain degree, demoralizes those who make it, those who sell it, and those who drink it. I believe from the time it issues from the coiled and poisonous worm of the distillery until it empties into the hell of crime, death and dishonor, it demoralizes everybody that touches it. I do not believe that anybody can contemplate the subject without becoming prejudiced against the liquid crime. All you have to do, gentlemen, is to think of the wrecks upon either bank of the stream of death—of the suicides, of the insanity, of the poverty, of the ignorance, of the distress, of the little children tugging at the faded dresses of weeping and despairing wives, asking for bread; of the men of genius it has wrecked; of the millions who have struggled with imaginary serpents produced by this devlish thing. And then when you think of the jails, of the almshouses, of the prisons, and of the scaffolds upon either bank—I do not wonder that every thoughtful man, is prejudiced against the damned stuff called alcohol."

Anything more or less, attributed to him as a "temperance" speech, is fabricated and fraudulent.

LIFE'S PROGRESSION.

"There is no death; there are no dead."

These words stand out on the cover of Edward C. Randall's new book. They are a challenge to the orthodox world, and through all of its pages runs this challenge to those whose ideas of God, of heaven, of hell, of a future life are based strictly upon the Bible. Yet Mr. Randall believes in life hereafter, based on positive knowledge given him from the living friends passed to the life beyond. Price $1.50.

DEDICATION OF THE ALLEN HALL AT ETNA, WASH.

The Coming Camp Meeting at That Place.—A Beautiful Location.

It seems that I am forced into the lecture field again. For several years for lack of remuneration sufficient to secure a livelihood I have been forced to retire, and give myself solely to the healing art, and here I have done a great amount of good, as I am no failure in chronic complaints and I save hundreds of poor souls from the cruel knife of the surgeon.

I have just returned from Etna, where I was called by that indefatigable worker, Henry B. Allen. Here I met Mrs. M. E. Congdon, of 699 E. Ninth street, Portland, Ore., and together we held a three days' meeting, the friends coming in the morning and remaining till the closing meeting at night. I tell you, Brother Francis, it seemed like old times, when there was such unity and enthusiasm among Spiritualists. Such fellowship is greatly needed in these days when so many attend meetings not so much to learn anything, or to grow intellectually, as find out whether they better make some trade, or invest in some mining scheme, or go to see something spectacular.

Etna is up the Lewis river, about nine miles above Woodland, and is reached by a carriage with the mail-man or the boat, Etna, which makes three trips a week, Mondays, Thursdays and Saturdays. It is the best fruit country in all Washington—just now the wild strawberries are in full bloom, saying nothing of the strawberries under cultivation. It has been colonized, largely by Spiritualists of the more progressive class, and to homeseekers in the East, who wish to get among a progressive people where they can raise a livelihood out of a few acres of land, obtainable on easy terms, I could not recommend a better sight. A camp meeting is held there each year, at which they have the best of lecturing talent, and excellent mediums, and the fact that people come for hundreds of miles in every direction, from Oregon, British Columbia, and different parts of this state demonstrates its popularity. Spiritualists in Washington and Oregon should not fail to attend this camp. There is no admittance, no ground rent, rent nor any other expense except what you may feel to contribute of your free will. You live out of doors or in your tent, among the grand old trees, holding communion with nature, your friends in earth life and the spirit world. It is a glorious place. I would not miss it for anything.

You old Spiritualists all either know Henry B. Allen, or know of him. In the early days of Spiritualism he was known as the "Allen Boy." He was and is a musical medium. At his sittings spirits play upon the dulcimer and guitar, also ring a small bell in time with the music, the guitar floating about the room and lighting on the heads or resting in the laps of the sitters while the music is in progress. Communications are written out from the friends of the sitters and thrust in their pockets or about their person somewhere, and spirit voices, the voices we so loved to hear in earthlife whisper their names to their friends. Each person in the circle has the privilege of holding one of Mr. Allen's hands, the other being held by some one meantime, on his right side. Mr. Allen has never made any money in his business. Whatever he has got, has been put right into the Cause. This is not much like the way our physical mediums generally do. Generally what they get goes right down into their pockets, and it is not quick to come out of there, except to satisfy some selfish object. But he is working for the good of Spiritualism. He gives the camp ground, built the hall, 30x70 feet, an eating house in front of it, and now, as in the past, assumes the responsibility of running a camp meeting through the entire month of August. This is the hall where we had our meetings. Here I met friends living in the neighborhood, and my brother, Moses Hull, and my old time friend, William Denton, who were so like themselves, I seemed to feel they were in their earthly bodies, and here I expect to meet old time friends in the flesh or in the spirit of other days next August.

SPOOKS IN ASHEVILLE.

Ghosts Swing from the Ceilings and Terrify the Prisoners.

Asheville, N. C.—The authorities have ordered a thorough investigation to be made at the county jail where all kinds of uncanny sounds are heard in the night and unaccountable objects are seen. The prisoners have been badly frightened and many of them found the following morning by Jailer Mitchell in a high state of excitement. It is declared by Jailer Mitchell that it is not a ruse on the part of the prisoners, for he knows it to be a fact that mysterious persons are seen at night at the jail and the most weird cries and sounds are heard. Sheriff Hunter has ordered a night ghost watch to be put on to try to solve the mystery.

Another visitation of the ghosts took place last night and the prisoners were wild from fright. Several of them fainted and were found this morning by the jailer in a dull stupor. They declared that two ghosts came to the jail last night, let themselves in through the iron grating, carried heavy iron chains aand swung to and from the jail ceiling upon ropes. They refused to talk, but made it known by signs that they would return later and make known their business.—Special to the New York World.

The Cause at Muskogee, Okla.

To the Editor: At the last business meeting of the Church of Spiritual Harmony of this city my engagement was extended indefinitely. I have, therefore, settled in this city for the present at least. My son, Milton Baker, who is engaged in the Spiritualist ministry, will make this his home, when he is not busy lecturing in the various cities in Oklahoma and adjacent state that occasionally employ his service.

I have not worked in a city for "many a day" where the meetings are as well attended as in Muskogee. When the weather and other conditions are favorable, our large hall is absolutely full, even standing room being taxed to the utmost. Our society, however is not strong in numbers, and it is only by the generosity of one member, whose name I withhold from publication by request, that the work in this city had started. Inside of three months this one member has given close to two hundred dollars to meet the expenses of the society; and this member, while, perhaps, in a better financial condition than the others, is far from being rich, and had to make tremendous sacrifice to give this unusual donation.

Spiritualists who make ordinarily good salaries should be ashamed to be content with a subscription of a dollar a month. There has not been enough stress laid upon this doctrine of sacrifice with the Spiritualists.

If the members of orthodox churches were content to give twenty-five and fifty cents, and a dollar a month, these organizations would not flourish, as the most of them do at present.

PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

On April 16, 1908, my brother-in-law, Odin E. Grader, passed to spirit life, with the assurance that life is continuous. He was taught from childhood the philosophy of Spiritualism; so we feel his tweny-nine years spent on earth prepared him for his life. He was injured by falling a distance of twenty feet, transition taking place ten days later. His father, three sisters and three brothers preceded him to the great beyond. A mother, sister and two brothers are left to miss his daily companionship. MRS. VICTORIA GRADER, Everett, Wash.

Mr. Joseph Bailey passed to spirit life from the home of Dr. Fowler, on Broadway, Cleveland, O., April 26, aged 87 years. He was a close friend of Dr. and Mrs. Fowler and a member of their household for many years. He was a Spiritualist, tried and true. Funeral services conducted by the writer.
FRANCES SPALDING.

Passed too the higher life, May 4, 1908, Wm. Goethe, of 1121 F. st., San Diego, Cal., aged 56 years, and a staunch Spiritualist. He leaves a wife and four small children, the youngest a daughter, only 11 days old. The family were left almost destitute. A very beautiful funeral service was conducted by Mrs. Katie H. Harveston, of the First Spiritualist Temple. T. J. McFERON, Sec.
San Diego, Cal

Passed to spirit life May 6, Guy Lambert, son of Maggie and Frank Wesson, aged 19 months and 27 days, at Johnsstown, Jasper county, Missouri. Funeral services conducted by the writer and was the first Spiritualist funeral ever conducted at that place.
ELLA WESTON THOMAS.
Webb City, Mo.

Mr. A. R. Arrowsmith, 516 Wenzel street, Louisville, Ky., passed to the higher life May 12. He has been a faithful subscriber and reader of The Progressive Thinker for a good many years, and has lived a beautiful and ideal life; never a fear for the change from this life to the next. He was born in England, Stockton-on-the-Tees, in 1855, and came to the country in 1884. MRS. O. L. BIRCH.

Passed to the higher life from her home in Cattaraugus, N. Y., May 7, Mrs. Jane Ann Burroughs, aged 68 years. April 6 her husband was called away, and as the husband and wife had walked the journey of life hand in hand 51 years, the bond seemed too strong to leave one on earth. Mrs. Burroughs leaves two sons and three daughters, and a mother who is over 91 years old. Funeral service by the writer. Interment in the family plot at New Albion, N. Y.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

This department is under the management of
HUDSON TUTTLE.
Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Everyone has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected. HUDSON TUTTLE.

An Old Spiritualist:—Q.—Do you think it wise to publish such articles as those of Carrington?

A.—The truthfulness and fairness of Carrington are not questioned. His investigations were made in the "scientific" manner which Spiritualists have so often demanded. If these mediums did not stand the tests, it is better than to have them go on. Now they will have to show the accusations false or close up their nefarious business. It is always policy to be honest, and the truth is never out of season. Carrington was more fortunate than I in arranging for seances. During two seasons at Cassadaga I attempted in vain to arrange for a seance with the mediums advertised. There was one exception, and that—because I would not say I was satisfied—later brought a brutal assault by the "slate writer." While sitting one evening with Mrs. Tuttle on the porch of the "Speakers' Cottage," this "slate writer" approached me and without warning struck me a blow that sent me off my chair, and in attempting to regain my feet, I caught a post of the porch, preventing a fall to the ground. Only my stiff hat, which received the blow, saved me from serious injury. The "medium" was seized by friends and held, acting like a raging maniac, with awful oaths declaring he would kill me, and it was sickening to hear the talk of those who "believed," of "poor obsessed boy," and how I had been the cause by my stupid objection to publicly saying I believed, when I knew the trick played on me.

Now it has come to the pass I foretold many years ago, to which paid mediumship would surely lead. It is as incongruous to place mediumship for sale as it would be to set a price on the sunlight. It is against the order of things to measure spiritual things by material. No one can set up in the trade of mediumship, with honesty, for money-getting.

The temptations to exceed all this with bizarre manifestations has led to more and more daring attempts, until now it seems the very foundation of Spiritualism rest on IMPOSSIBLE manifestations. Impossible, and to that extent which makes denial of their genuineness almost unnecessary.

Mrs. I. A. T., Columbus, O.—Q.—We are very successful in our circle with moving of the table and rappings, but we have added the trumpet, and desire to know how to succeed in receiving communications by its means.

A.—There are no special rules about placing the trumpet, or its use. It is probably best to lay it on the table and await results.

If you are successful with the methods you speak of, it is altogether best to cultivate your mediumship along the lines thus indicated. Anxiety to receive communications through other phases is detrimental to your progress in the method thus prescribed. The communicating spirits avail themselves of the conditions furnished them, and the most satisfactory results will come by allowing perfect freedom. When the trumpet is found by them available, it will be used, and the less disturbing thought you give it the better. Really you have a most convincing and desirable phase of communication.

Nellie P. Thompson:—Q.—(1) Do you approve of the Saturday night dances at the Spiritual camp-meetings? I may be prejudiced but I cannot. Before I read of dancing and card playing at the camps, I supposed they were places where seekers went to gain a knowledge of future life. I attended a certain camp and as I came through the gate and approached the hotel a party was sitting at the table playing cards, and on introduction I found one was the speaker, another a medium, and the others pillars of the camp! Had I brought friends who were coming out of the church to Spiritualism, what would they have thought? There may be no harm, but is it not well to avoid the appearance of evil.

(2) What does Spiritualism teach as to the resurrection of Jesus?

A.—(1) Our correspondent admits that there may be no harm in dancing or card-playing, and if the church members would not criticise, there would be no objection. A camp-meeting for the time is a social community, and must furnish hours of relaxation. It would be rather tedious to have continuous seances or lectures. The most instructive and eloquent speaker becomes wearisome at the end of two hours, if not long before. There is an abundance of time for seances and lectures, and one evening in seven is small allowance for the enjoyment of social pleasures. As for dancing, the prejudice against it is entire puritanical. The ancient nations, one and all, worshiped by dancing, the Hebrews not excepted. David was one of the gayest dancers, and his zeal at times made him a performer such as would not now be tolerated at any Spiritual camp, nor variety show—"open for men only." The Bible teaches that he was a man after God's own heart, and hence even such dancing is acceptable to God!

Dancing may be made immoral, and to pander to depravity, or it may become promotive of esthetic taste as the embodiment of music and motion. There is intense prejudice against cards, also puritanic in origin. I remember once seeing in an old Bible a full-page picture of the Devil; he had a pack of cards in one hand, a pitchfork in the other, and for a tuft on his tail, a fiddle! What more symbolism could an orthodox painter represent? The Devil played cards for souls! The game may be very, very bad—immoral and blighting. If stakes are played for, the worst passions in human nature are aroused. But a social game for the amusement of the home, what harm! And if there is no harm, why should not speakers and mediums play the game? No one supposes Spiritual camp-meetings are held for orthodox pleasure. If church members attend they will be sure to find many things with which they will not agree. Well, if we Spiritualists should from misguided curiosity attend an orthodox service we should probably find more to excite our criticism—especially if we chanced on a revival service. We should object to the teachings about hell, Devil, punishment, and a thousand things grown obsolete, some centuries dead, and "our feelings" would be hurt seriously when the preacher told us about hell being paved with infant's skulls. I have sat patiently and heard that doctrine taught, and was glad my liberal friends were not there with me—oh, much more rejoiced than our correspondent was when she found the speaker playing cards, that her church friends were not present!

At a church fair the devout sisters sold kisses at the exorbitant price of 25 cents each, and at another thrust a foot from under a curtain, and sold it to attend supper with the purchaser—of course its owner went with the foot thus sold!

If I had been a church member, I would have been ashamed to see a Spiritualist there! And when the grab-bag lottery came round I would have been ashamed that I was a church member!

I have attended church camp-meetings and revivals, carried on by noted evangelists, and when the weeping sisters came "forward" to the anxious seat, seen the evangelists go on their knees beside them, and with embracing arm whisper low in their ears. The presumption is that they spoke Godly words, about the love of Jesus—we give them the benefit of the doubt. It struck an observer, however, that the love of Jesus was expressed quite differently by these evangelists and preachers, when the recipient was a man!

I have seen things that made even church members stammer an apology. Now, has anyone ever seen a Spiritual speaker come down from his desk and—I scarcely know how to describe what he shall do—well, say—do as these preachers do? If speakers ever thus made a show of themselves I would not care to have modest and virtue-loving orthodox friends present—well, it would not be to the credit of the meeting to have policemen too near.

Spiritualism may be a religion, but it has not yet become so religious that it has to carry such a load.

If any apology is required, church members should make the same, at the end of every meeting. They should apologize, if for nothing else, for teaching the dogmas of the creeds, against common sense, and the revelations of science.

(2) The consensus of all spirit teachings are that Christ was a mediumistic seer, but there is as great diversity as among mortals. Some inform us that they have seen Christ very much as the churches would have us believe; others say he never existed; others that he was a great and good man; others that he was a myth—creation. You may choose, as reason or prejudice dictates.

IOWA WOMEN SCORE.

Miss Grace Ballantyne, the young attorney, who appeared for "Mary J. Coggeshall and others" in their suit against the city of Des Moines, is receiving congratulations from many quarters because of the favorable decision of the Supreme Court. The women questioned the validity of a special election on a bond issue for a city hall because the votes of taxpaying women were refused and the Supreme Court has issued a restraining order stopping all work on the new city building pending the final decision on the women's case.

Rev. Anna H. Shaw, president of the National American Woman Suffrage Association, says: "This fight of the Iowa women has put more heart into me than anything which has come my way for a long time. I hope they will succeed."

Spirit Return.

It Is Overshadowing the Whole World—Notwithstanding the Carrington Episode at the Lily Dale Camp.

EVEN IN THE "ETERNAL" CITY.

In Rome the Cult of Spirit Return is Headed by an Italian Princess, as Set Forth in a Special Cable to the Atlanta (Ga.) Constitution.

Rome, April 25.—Although the University of Rome recently rejected the proposition to establish a chair of psychical research for the scientific investigation of ghosts, astral doubles and occult phenomena generally it must not be inferred that the cult of the spook attracts little attention here. The Eternal City has more haunted houses and probably a larger percentage of believers in Spiritualism than any other city in the world. They are found in all grades of society, and at the present time aristocratic circles are much given to entertaining mediums and visitors from the other world.

The recognized leader among them is the Princess d'Antuni del Drago. She bears not the slightest resemblance to the popular conception of a feminine ghost-chaser. She is a widow, young, pretty and accomplished. She is not only a believer in spirits, but claims to be a medium also. It was she who drew from Marconi the acknowledgment that there was "something in it" which science—at least as much of it as he knew—could not explain. Further than that he would not go, but as this was the result of one sitting only with the princess, there is no telling where he would have ended had he continued his investigations.

Not Like Other Girls.

Princess d'Antuni belongs to the aristocratic house of Potenziani, and owns the handsome del Drago palace, and has thus been landlady to the last two American ambassadors. She says that as a child she was conscious of voices and visions which troubled her little soul, but which her skeptical elders attributed to imagination. She married very young, but it was after this that she became conscious that she was not quite as other people, that she had powers which were denied to them, and which now make her a remarkable medium.

A few months after her marriage she relates, she was lying in bed one evening reading, when the bedclothes suddenly dropped to the floor, as though snatched away by impatient hands. She turned, surprised, and became conscious of a cloud, as it were, between her and the light. As she gazed, the shadow took the form and substance and assumed the aspect of a woman dressed in black. When the princess made an involuntary movement to rise, the apparition said in a solemn voice: "Do not be frightened, I come in love. I am your husband's first wife, and come to warn you that you will have a son, but he will not live. Give this to Ferdinando as a proof of my love," at the same time holding out a lock of hair.

The princess' entranced senses then burst their bounds, and she shrieked with fear. Hearing her cries, Prince d'Antuni, who was in the next room, rushed to her and found her half fainting. He also saw as he entered the room, so he said, the shadowy form of a woman, for the ghost had begun to dissolve into thin air. Neither would have believed the reality of what they had seen had it not been for the lock of hair which was lying on the floor, and which, being compared with that of the late princess, was found to be identical.

Warned Child Would Die.

In due course a son and heir was born to the happy couple, who forgot the warning, but their joy was short-lived, as the first Princess d'Antuni appeared again to her successor, in almost the same circumstances as before. "I am come to warn you," she said, "the other time you forgot my words, but now do not let a moment pass without having the boy baptized. My poor child, he will only live a day or two. Take heed of my words, and do not delay the baptism." The poor mother hugged her apparently healthy baby in her arms, but sent for the priest, had the ceremony performed, and the next day she was childless. The doctor declared himself baffled. "I never knew a perfectly healthy baby to die in that way before," he exclaimed.

From this time on Princess d'Antuni has had many manifestations and warnings of a supernatural character. One day, she states, she had been at a Kirmese at the Pincio where she presided over a stall in the bridal dress of a Genoese peasant, and made lots of sales. She entered her carriage with a friend in the highest of good spirits to return home, when suddenly she felt as though a pall had settled over her, and when asked by her companion what was the matter replied that she was sure that when they met again something dreadful would have happened. The next day she was standing before her mirror, when she saw her husband's reflection in it. "What! you, Ferdinando!" she exclaimed and turned round, but could see no one. Her maid, Maria, said that the prince must have been in the room as she had heard his footsteps, but on going to look for him found that he was not in the house. Meanwhile Prince d'Antuni, who was at the capital, had been seized with a fainting sensation and simultaneously, he declared, saw his wife before her glass. That night he was taken ill and died ten days later. For three months after his death, the princess asserts she was able to hold telepathic communication with him, and was greatly solaced thereby.

A Wonderful Woman.

She has had several seances with the celebrated medium, Paladino. On one of these occasions the latter sat down at a table and began to write. She covered two or three pages of paper with what both she and her friends supposed to be rubbish; the letters were there, but they made no sense. The paper, however, was examined, and proved to be the purest Arabic, which language certainly neither Princess d'Antuni nor the Palladino have any knowledge of whatever.

The Palladino herself is really a wonderful woman. She is totally uneducated, but when in a trance speaks in several modern languages and even writes them correctly and grammatically. Not long ago experiments were tried with this Neapolitan woman at the University of Naples with results which surprised those present as they were all unbelievers. Professor Bottazzi, one of the scientists present, happening to touch Palladino's hand when she was unconscious, an electric light near her was at once lighted, and this happened every time he repeated the experiment. The professor also vouches for the statement that apparently a human hand was laid upon his neck and arm. He touched it and could have sworn that it was human, but on the lights being turned on unexpectedly, it did not disappear suddenly, but faded, that is, dissolved into thin air, as he held it.

Lombroso a Convert.

The latest convert in Italy to a belief in the unseen is Professor Cesare Lombroso, the celebrated criminologist, who, however, has dabbled in "Spiritualism" for many years, but it was through Palladino that he at last confessed that many of the wonderful manifestations are absolutely authentic and not to be explained by science. The seance which is said to have convinced the eminent scientist was held in a dining room by gas light, and the only apparatus provided was a small iron bedstead and mattress for the medium, which was placed in a window alcove, with a curtain of dark, woolen stuff between it and the spectators, who sat about four feet distant. The clothing of the medium was thoroughly examined. Signora Palladino allowed herself to be bound to the iron bed by her wrists, her feet and her waist, and after about a quarter of an hours various knockings came from the table placed just outside the curtains. The curtain then opened, and the head and part of the body of a young woman appeared, clothed in a white garment. One of those present having remarked that the white wrappings allowed only a part of the face to be seen, the points of the fingers of hands appeared and drew aside the folds. Before disappearing the head bowed towards the spectators, and the sound of a kiss was audible. After a few minutes the figure of a stout, broad-shouldered man emerged from behind the curtain. Finally the figure of another woman appeared, this time with a child in her arms.

Of a different character were the experiences of Gabriel d'Annunzio, the great Italian poet and dramatist. Merely for fun he had attended seances at the house of a friend, Marquis Olemente Origo. The communications received were obtained through a table in the way familiar to Spiritualists. On one occasion the poet expressed his contempt, both for the communication and the communicator.

Incensed the Spook.

That greatly incensed the spook that was working the table telegraph system, and it began butting at d'Annunzio with the table. Not liking this d'Annunzio left his seat. But the table, tilted on two legs, followed him rapidly. Taken by surprise he moved a few steps backwards, but his movements were not quick enough, for the table suddenly hurled itself at him with such force that he was dashed against the wall. The marquis succeeded in calming the spirit, and the seance was resumed, but only on the condition stipulated by the inivisible guest, that d'Annunzio should not sit at the table. The spirit was then asked its name, which it refused to give. It was then asked its opinion of the poet's work and rapped out this response: "Smoke, all smoke, and like smoke, will vanish, leaving no trace behind." D'Annunzio said something to the effect that his spook critic did not know what good poetry was. Then the table went for him again and literally chased him out of the room. Since then d'Annunzio has attended no more seances. He is convinced that if there are such things as spirits they are of an inferior order of intelligence.

There are several Americans in Rome who thoroughly believe in ghosts. Among the most convinced is the celebrated sculptor, Ezekiel, who comes from Virginia. He has had many experiences, but the one he most cherishes is the vision he had of his mother the night she died. He was in his bedroom, here in Rome stretched on his bed, and she was, he supposed, in America. Suddenly, he says, the light flickered, and, looking up, he saw a female figure at the further side of his long room. Surprised, he rose on his elbow, and watched. The apparition slowly approached the bed and then, turning its head, gazed at him sorrowfully. Then recognizing his mother he sprang up exclaiming, "Mother! You here!" But she gave no answer and faded from his sight. The next morning brought him a cablegram informing him of his mother's death in America.

Mr. Franklin Simmons, another American sculptor, is also interested in the occult, especially since the death of his wife a few years ago. He says that he received frequent communications from her, and that in this way she helped him greatly with his famous monument, the "Angel of the Resurrection," which he raised to her memory in the Protestant cemetery here.—Constance Harriman in Atlanta Constitution.

A HOT TIME IN ENGLAND.

A Primitive Methodist Berates Spiritualists and Gets a Reply.

To the Editor: I have just received a communication from a brother Spiritualist in Whitehaven, Cumberland, England, and he says in part: "The Primitive Methodists announced that they were going to have their champion debater against Spiritualism lecture in the Y. M. C. A. hall, Whitehaven, Eng., so he went to hear him, and the hall was packed. It took an hour and a half for the lecture, he said, and he said that everything that was vile, the minister said about Spiritualism. A few of the remarks he made were as follows: That they, the Spiritualists, were frauds, free-lovers, liars and thieves, and anything else that a debased mind could think of; that they had no religion, and were not scientific; we had no philosophy, and he went on to explain things from his own point of view, and finished his lecture by offering £10, or $50, to any charitable institution, if any medium would produce a materialized form under his test condition, that was, when the form appeared, he would be allowed to fire a loaded revolver at the form, and if it turned out to be the medium imposing, and he or she got killed, that he would not be held responsible for their death. He also said that what belief we as Spiritualists have, we stole from Buddha, Confucius, Paine, Hume, Ingersoll, and the Bible, and any whose else we could steal from, and that we hypnotized the people, who attended our meetings, and that if his satanic majesty were looking for a wife, he could not recommend him a better partner than Spiritualism.

At the close of the lecture the chairman asked if there was a Spiritualist in the hall who would like to say anything in answer to the lecturer. So Mr. H. Perkin, being one, jumped to his feet and said that he was proud that he was one, and especially so, after he had heard the unwarranted and uncharitable address; and he gave the audience a few facts, which they had to accept because they had actually happened. And he asked his audience if there was a man in the hall who knew him (and most all the men present knew him), if any of them could point their finger at him and say that he was a free-lover, idiot, rogue, or liar. He said the lecturer had proven himself a liar, and that it was a shame among so much poverty, that a minister who claimed to follow Him who had nowhere to lay His head, and who said to the rich young man, "Go sell that thou hast and give to the poor," should have $35 or $30 to gamble with. Then he asked the lecturer how long it would take for a Spiritualist to get to the heaven beyond the stars and clouds, seeing that the nearest star was about thirty-eight million miles away. Did not the lowly Nazarene say, "The kingdom of heaven is within you?" Then he asked him about his little puny God, who was ready to send all into everlasting flames if they did not please Him. Then he told him of the Infinite Intelligence, who filled everywhere, so that if he, Brother Parkin, went to hell, that intelligence was there. The lecturer said he did not believe in the orthodox hell. Brother Parkin said to him, "You ought to think shame of yourself to take your salary, and that you are a bigger rogue and liar than any Spiritualist, because your church pays you to preach hell-fire, and that they had not altered, they preached it ten or fifteen years ago, from the Bible, and you claimed it to be the inspired word of God, and if it was right then, it must be the same now, which closed the argument. When Brother Parkin got outside he got the warmest handshakes he ever received at any time in his life, and he had a great many inquiries into our beautiful truth, and the prospects for the future are that the seed from our side is taking effect. Brother Parkin closed his communication by saying he received his Progressive Thinker every week, and that words cannot express the joy it is to him to see the mailman land at the door with it, as it beats any other Spiritualist paper by many miles.

WHERE ARE THE WITNESSES.

We Cannot Fathom the Ocean of Cosmic Possibilities.

Few thinking Spiritualists will fail to endorse Mr. Daniel Hull's logical arguments against reincarnation, or even against pre-existence of the spirit, as maintained by Dr. Peebles, our faithful veteran. See Progressive Thinker, Mar. 28).

Does not the dear doctor seem rather intemperate in the joy of living? He is not satisfied with having benefited this pretty globe of ours for more than eighty years, with a fair prospect of unlimited years yet ahead of him on earth, and eternal life to follow. O, no! he wants to trace his existence back beyond the first labored vibrations of chaos; and his sturdy individuality must have been there to watch the atoms of matter congregate into the first molecules.

But where are the witnesses pro and con? There are none for "Ghostland," either; Chevalier de B—— being the only witness of the weird facts he is relating.

Brother Hull desires to learn the opinions of other readers of "Ghostland." Well, I for one, attempted to present mine some years ago, as the book "haunted" me, as books do sometimes. But when I earnestly faced the task, I, just like Brother Hull, "found myself in water beyond my depth."

I could not "swallow" that formidable array of unprecedented "facts" and—I confess—I lacked courage to say so in the face of so much unimpeachable testimony to the author's spotless name, high intellectuality, and nobility of purpose. So, as far as I can remember, I did not mention details, but gave only my general honest impressions and the expression of my boundless admiration for book and author.

To-day, "Ghostland" is, in my opinion, still the most wonderful book I ever read, and, should it be classified among novels, I deem it the most fascinating, the most soul-stirring novel I came across in all my life. As for casting any doubt upon the Chevalier's alleged facts, I am now less than ever disposed to deny what I cannot disprove.

A book of a similar fascinating nature, though different in facts, is "Zanoni," by Bulwer Lytton. I must read it again, as well as "Ghostland." Just now my spare moments are monopolized by our generous editor's last premium book, "Interwoven," a unique book; as interesting as it is instructive; highly charming in its quaintness and simplicity, and yet straining our capacity of belief to the utmost in some respects, while in others it is corroborating many statements about spirit-life given by our best mediums.

The book is a mine of original suggestions.

The more I explore the field of our priceless occult literature, the more it dawns on me that the contradictions we complain so much about are mainly due to difference of individual views and conceptions of spirits and mediums, and, and—last, not least—to their individual experiences. Therefore, can it behoove anybody to be positive concerning conditions in spirit-life? Let us be modest!

The cardinal fact of spirit-communion and unlimited individual progress beyond the grave should satisfy our fastidious expectations. We can afford to wait for more, until the curtain is lifted. Meanwhile, we must not be down on the skeptic who denies our best-proven phenomena; to him they may seem more chimerical than appears to us the gigantic figures that intercepted the view of the Chevalier and his friends on Ross' observatory. We have a right to reason about alleged facts; but we cannot DETERMINE FACTS BY REASON.

We cannot fathom the ocean of cosmic possibilities from our limited horizon on earth; and who knows whether even the wisest investigators will ever reach its bottom in all eternity.

Another Season Near Its Close.

This is the fifth season I have been here with the Columbus people, and it is with a feeling of deep regret when I remember this is to be the last for a time. I have contracted with the First Society of Baltimore for next year. No matter where I may go in the future, I will never find a more devoted, energetic people than I have here, but I realize it is not good for either speaker or society to remain too long under the same environment. But I do know from my experience here that much better work can be done by settling the workers for a season or more at least.

The Ladies' Auxiliary of this society is its mainstay, as the women usually are in everything. This season they earned $525, and turned over $375 of it to the main society, besides little extras. This is not only a financial service, but is the heart of the whole thing, as is every good working auxiliary.

I hope my people here will fall into good and efficient hands until my return, for I have had to promise I will come back later.

I am now looking forward to the camp season, which I hope will be a successful one in every way for the cause. I feel there was never a time when our cause was in a more healthy condition in general. With all the stir-up the GREAT INTELLECTS are making in exposing some things, it is but making us stronger. With all the thousand and one theories brought forward to explain us away, there has as yet never been ONE that I know of that could explain everything, and the more they try to upset it, the more they are discovering the spirit-man and the subtle laws of nature's operation.

Let the good work go on.

With greetings from the First Spiritualist Society of Columbus, Ohio, to the workers one and all at large.

Sincerely,

ELIZABETH HARLOW.

After June 1, address Haydenville, Mass.

CONNECTICUT SPIRITUALISTS.

The Twenty-second Annual Convention of the State Association.

The twenty-second annual convention of the Connecticut State Spiritualist Association was held in Unity hall, Hartford, Saturday and Sunday, May 2 and 3. Business meeting opened at 10:15 a. m. Saturday, with the first vice-president, Mr. George Hatch, in the chair the report of the secretary, Mrs. J. E. B. Dillon, was Hatch, in the chair; the report of the treasurer, Mr. Edward Brewer, was read, showing a balance in the treasury of $242.92; the auditor attested to the correctness of the treasurer's report, and it was accepted. Mrs. A. E. Merriam gave a report of the National Spiritualists' Association convention held in Washington in October, 1907, she being one of the delegates to represent the State Association at that time.

The election of officers for the ensuing year resulted in the election of the old board: President, A. A. Gustine, of Meriden; vice-presidents, George Hatch, of South Windham; Mrs. E. A. Lamberton, of Poquonock; secretary, Mrs. J. E. B. Dillon, of Hartford; treasurer, Edward Brewer, of East Hartford; trustees, Dumont Kingsley, George E. Cooley, Charles L. Smith, all of Hartford. The election of delegates to the N. S. A. convention to be held at Indianapolis in October was postponed until Sunday at the conference meeting. It was decided to hold the next convention in Hartford at Unity hall, the first Saturday and Sunday in May, 1909. A State Day is also to be held at the Niantic camp grounds July 29. E. B. Kenyon, of New Haven, president of the camp association, made a brief speech in which he expressed regret that the business meetings were so thinly attended, and said it was the duty of every Spiritualist to attend.

The afternoon session opened at 2:30, with the president, A. A. Gustine, in the chair. After music and reading of a poem, and invocation, Mr. J. C. F. Grumbine, of Boston, took for his subject "The Occult Science of the Bible." At 7:45 p. m. Mrs. H. P. Russegue gave an invocation, and Mr. G. Tabor Thompson, of Philadelphia, followed with a lecture on "The Divine Gift of Spiritualism." at 10:30 a. m. Sunday a conference was held in Alliance hall; delegates were chosen as follows to attend the N. S. A. convention in October: President, A. A. Gustine, Mrs. H. P. Russegue. They were given the power to appoint their own alternates if unable to go. The following resolution was presented upon the death of Mrs. Nora Dowd, which occurred Friday evening, May 1st:

Resolution: The Connecticut State Spiritualist Association now in convention at Hartford, regrets to learn of the sudden transition of our sister and coworker, Mrs. Nora Dowd, at Lake Pleasant, Mass. A faithful worker in the cause of Spiritualism and the State convention; a woman of sterling qualities and loving nature. It is resolved that we, the Spiritualists of Connecticut, do hereby convey our sympathies to the sister, Mrs. F. J. Storrs, and to the husband whose companion has passed into the Great Beyond.

The meeting was then opened for conference, and very interesting remarks were made by Dr. Taylor, Mrs. Russegue, Mr. Beecher, Mr. Kenyon, Mr. Gustine and many others. This meeting is one of the best features of the convention. At 2:30 we met again at Unity hall, where, after an invocation by Mr. Edgar W. Emerson, Mr. G. Tabor Thompson again spoke, taking for his subject "Spiritual Messages Untrue in All Ages." This lecture was of particular interest, and was listened to with great attention. At 7:30, after reading of poems and an invocation, Mr. J. C. F. Grumbine delivered a lecture on Spiritualism, the Universal Religion." In closing his lecture he touched the American flag on the pulpit and said he believed it would some day be the banner of a universal republic, of which the religion would be Spiritualism. He was given a great ovation at the close. Mr. Edgar W. Emerson, of Manchester, N. H., the well known psychic, followed each lecture with messages which were very correct and demonstrated the truth of the philosophy of Spiritualism. The Arion Male Quartette of Hartford furnished music at all the sessions, and helped to make the convention a success. The convention closed Sunday evening, with the feeling that we had realized a spiritual feast long to be remembered.

Letter from Charles J. Anderson.

To the Editor: I know you have an impression of me somewhere in your memory. More than ten years ago I was known on the Pacific Coast as the "boy orator," and have still in my possession a very kind and encouraging letter from your pen. I am not quite as "boyish" now, but affirm gladly that I am blessed with all the enthusiasm of youth. For the past eleven years I have given myself to the advocacy of the Spiritual philosophy and liberalism generally in various sections of the Pacific Coast region. My attitude has been broad and I have lectured from many platforms representative of the new philosophy. Spiritualism, Mental Science, New Thought and kindred movements have claimed my time and interest, and for sixteen months I occupied the pulpit of the Unitarian church in Santa Cruz, California, as a "free lance." I may say that in all these avenues I have discovered the footprints of Spiritualism. Its principles are universal in scope and embrace all that is TRUE in the great world movements, ancient and modern.

I wish to enlarge my field of work, and write this letter to you and your paper with that end in view. Hitherto my field has been limited to the Pacific Coast states. I have yet to make my first appearance in the Middle West and East, and I now announce myself in readiness to accept engagements with societies in the sections above mentioned for the summer and fall. In addition to my lectures on the "Powers of the Soul," I give readings from the psychometric basis. Anyone wishing more information as to my standing in the Western lecture field, may write Mr. W. J. Colville, who is at present in Alameda, California. My address for the present will be San Antonio, Texas, 201 Jackson, street.

SPIRITUALISM—Progress, the Universal Law of Nature; Thought, the Solvent of Her Problems.—SPIRITUALISM

VOL. 38 CHICAGO, ILL., MAY 30, 1908 NO. 966

A Study in Occultism.

A History of a Strange Case.

We take especial pleasure in presenting to our readers the article by David P. Abbott, of Omaha, Neb., a prestidigitator, an author of note, and a man widely known and esteemed. His opinion, under the circumstances, carries great weight, and will be read with untiring interest. The article is taken from the Open Court, and is published by special permission, it being a copyright production. It illustrates very comprehensively the hold that Spirit Return has taken on the world at large.

I.

Is Spiritualism all deception and illusion? Is there no grain of truth to be found under the great mass of fraud and trickery with which a vast army of charlatans have disgraced it? Are the efforts of the Society for Psychical Research to prove fruitless? When all of the fraud and deception is cleared away, will nothing remain? These questions I have asked time and again. What will the answer be?

Do no whisperings of hope from the great beyond ever echo down the infinite corridors of darkness? Will the pale vanished faces of our loved ones, that haunt the shadowy mists of memory, ever again stand before us in the bright sunlight of day? Will we ever again hear the dear voices that have long been stilled? Must we, with tottering steps supported only by blind faith, go down the hillside of life into the infinite darkness of the eternal valley? Is there no turning aside—no escape? Must we face the inevitable annihilation of the unity of self? When science lifts her torch and peers into the surrounding darkness, is there no gleam of hope to be seen? Will a new dawn ever break, with its countless songs of gladness bursting from the throats of the twittering love-birds of joy? Oh, beautiful Nature, how thy children adore thee! Oh, infinite Power, that animates and directs the great All, why this insatiable longing for immortality in the hearts of thy children.

I have been asked again and again, if, in all of my investigations, I have found nothing that I could not explain; if all has been perfectly simple and commonplace as soon as I witnessed it; if all of the mystery and romance disappear upon investigation. I have finally removed certain difficulties to publication, and shall now give to the public an account of the most remarkable case that it has ever been my fortune to investigate. Among all the cases of my investigation, it stands unique and alone, entirely in a class by itself; still to a certain extent shrouded in mytery, with some features which I have not yet thoroughly explained satisfactorily to myself. The memory of this remarkable experience, and the weird and dramatic effect of what on the surface appeared to be the voices of the dead talking to me and exhibiting an intimate knowledge of my family history, will remain with me through life.

II.

On March 7, 1906, the carrier left at my door a letter that was destined to disturb my peace of mind, and to furnish me much material for thought for some time to come. Shortly before this I had published in The Open Court an article entitled, "Some Mediumistic Phenomena." I had vaguely wondered if this would not indirectly bring to my notice some accounts of strange phenomena from remote places in the world. Such was this missive.

This letter was written by a gentleman in New Haven, Connecticut; and in it he described a strange case that he had witnessed in a remote village one year before. The writer, Mr. E. A. Parsons, was unknown to me; but he introduced himself as a magician. He stated that having read my article and noted my knowledge of trickery, he desired to lay this case before me, in the hope that I might be able to explain it. I here quote from his letters:

"I will describe an experience which I had with an elderly lady in a little town in Ohio last year. She uses two tin horns or trumpets, each fourteen inches long, and two and one-half inches in diameter at the large ends, tapering to one inch at the smaller ends. The large end or bell of one horn is so made as to slip tightly into the large end of the other. On the smaller or outer ends of this double trumpet are soldered saucer-shaped pieces large enough to cover a person's ear. The trumpet is empty and can be examined by any one.

"Her VERY MARVELOUS POWER is this: The sitter takes one end of this trumpet and places it to his ear, while the lady does the same with the other end, placing it to her ear. At once the sitter plainly hears whispers in the trumpet. These purport to be the voices of the spirits of his dead friends and relatives. They reply to any questions which he speaks out loud. During this time the lady's mouth and lips are tightly closed, and she makes no motions of the throut or lips. She will, instead of holding the trumpet to her ear, hold her palm against it; or allow him to place one end of it against her back. She will, if preferred, permit two spectators to each hold an end, she merely touching the center with her fingers. In either event one hears the whispering just the same. Now this is done in broad daylight, anywhere, even out of doors. I investigated this phenomenon seven hours altogether, giving it every possible test," but could obtain no clue to it. I found that it was not ventriloquism, as the voices were really in the trumpet; besides, ventriloquists can not speak in whispers. I proved beyond question (as have many others) that the voices were really in the trumpet.

"The information which I received from the whispers was correct in every case. I had never seen the lady before, nor had I been in Ohio previously. Now the production of intelligent language inside this trumpet in daylight, three or four feet away from the medium, I regard as more wonderful than anything I have ever known. I now have the trumpet, having purchased it. Can you tell me how the whispered words were produced?"

In a subsequent letter he said: "The description I gave you was not overdrawn in any way. The lady is the wife of an humble farmer and resides in an obscure country village. She has resided there all of her life and has reared a large family of children. She has never been over twenty miles from her home and has but little education. She is, however, very intelligent. She gave her sittings for a long time free of charge, and later began charging ten cents. She now charges one dollar, but does not insist on anything.

"She can use a glass lamp-chimney or any closed receptacle in place of the trumpet; and I have heard the voices just as plainly coming out of the sound hole of a guitar that lay upon the table. The guitar has also played in my presence, independently, but faintly. There was no music box in it, as is generally the case. She has also caused music to sound in the trumpet, and raps to sound on the outside of it.

"Three of my most intimate friends have seen her several times. Two of them were with me at my investigation. I have known of this lady for six years; and finally, having heard so much about her, I journeyed six hundred miles to see her in January, 1905. The lady was at many times talking with persons in the room at the same time that I was listening to the voices. I noted this with great care. Sometimes two different voices would whisper at the same time, as if one were trying to get ahead of the other.

"Of course we know how mediums usually gather information, but this lady had no means of knowing anything about me; and yet the voices told me, correctly, many things of my own private life. Among those who talked with me were my mother, my daughter (dead twenty-two years), and my grandfather. My daughter told me where I lived, what kind of a house I lived in, what her living brother was doing, where she was buried, etc. An old music teacher of mine, of whom I had not thought for ten years, announced himself and said that he would like to play for me. Then I actually heard faint but distinct sounds of piano-playing in the trumpet, and my friends in the room also heard it. The sounds were like they would be if one were listening to a piano over a telephone. My father and my father-in-law spoke to me as did also an uncle of whom I had not knowledge, but whose existence I afterwards verified. My mother gave her own name completely, but failed to give my middle name. She gave it as 'Albert,' when in reality it is 'Augustus.'

"At one time I heard an open voice in the trumpet for a moment. I also listened at her mouth and throat when voices were speaking, but could detect no sounds. I found the positions of the voices in the trumpet would vary, sounding at one time nearer to one end, and at another nearer to the other end. I had noticed the varying strength of the voices, and the lady told me of this change of position. I verified it by listening outside the trumpet when others held it, and found the voices to vary one foot and a half in location. I was particularly impressed with the openness of the lady, and with her perfect willingness for me to test her powers in any manner that I desired. She afforded me every opportunity to make such tests, giving me seven or eight hours of her time. I suppose this thing to be a trick; but with over forty years' study of magic, and with the acquaintance of all the great magicians, I was entirely unable to even surmise how it could be done. It is either a trick or it is the work of His Satanic Majesty.

"Now I believe I have discovered a medium as good as Home, and I hesitate about making public her name and address. You understand, any medium possessing this secret would think his fortune made. I am no medium, but I certainly want the secret. If this prove to be a trick, I do not want its secret given to the world, but desire to keep it for private use. If you see fit to sign a contract binding yourself to respect this desire, and not to reveal the secret of the performance without my consent, I will be pleased to furnish you the name and address of the lady. I shall expect you to give me the fullest results of any investigations which you may make."

On receipt of this letter I immediately signed and returned the required agreement to Mr. Parsons. I received in return the coveted information. Being now at liberty to reveal all of the details, I shall state that the lady is Mrs. Elizabeth Blake, of Braderick, Ohio. There is a little village of a few houses, on the banks of the Ohio, just across the river, north, from Huntington, West Virginia. The place is reached from Huntington, most directly, by a row-boat ferry.

After receiving this information, I decided to try to learn from other sources if the case were really as described by Mr. Parsons. About this time I learned that the latter gentleman is well known in the world of magic under the nom de plume of "Henry Hardin," and that he is a dealer in magician's secrets. Had I received this account from other sources, I should have given it but little credence, inasmuch as I have investigated so many other cases, and have invariably found nothing but trickery. But here was a strange report from a man versed in the arts of trickery; an expert himself, and one not easily deceived. Surely, this, at least, warranted investigation.

I had always been very skeptical, never believing in spirit communion, telepathy, clairvoyance, or anything of the kind; and as to physical phenomena, I had found everything very commonplace and devoid of mystery when I had an opportunity to see it myself. I could not help wondering and pondering; and asking myself if, after all, it were possible for a being to exist on this earth with any powers out of the ordinary; or with any faculty not common to the rest of the race. Decidedly, I could not believe such a thing possible, and yet, how could an expert magician be deceived with such a thing? I felt greatly puzzled; and although I had no faith in spirit communion, decided to investigate further.

I wrote a letter to the professor of science in the schools at Huntington, telling him that I knew of a strange case of psychic phenomena in his vicinity, and proposing to engage him to investigate it for me. I was a member of the Society for Psychical Research and I offered to furnish him with proper credentials, etc. I enclosed a stamped envelope, but he did not even condescend to reply. Next, I wrote directly to Mrs. Blake, and invited her to visit my home. I told her I was a business man of Omaha, and offered to furnish references as to my standing. I also offered to defray all expenses of her journey.

Mrs. Blake did not reply in person; but I received a letter from a gentleman of very high standing, whom I shall call Dr. X—, as he does not desire me to use his name. This gentleman happened to be her physician. He informed me that Mrs. Blake had fallen from her chair at some previous time, rupturing the ligaments of her ankle; that this had resulted in blood poisoning and had left her crippled; that since that time she was compelled to go about on crutches; that inaction frequently resulted in attacks of acute indigestion; and that she was thus in such a state of health as to prevent her making any journey. He thanked me in her name for the invitation.

Now, this gentleman seemed to be accommodating; so I took the liberty of again writing him, asking for a report from him on the powers of his patient; for his own opinion of the case, etc. This he kindly gave me; and this was followed by several letters, going into great detail of what he considered the most important case in the world.

His report corroborated all that Mr. Parsons had written me; but I noticed that he attached greater importance to the information given by the voices, than he did to the phenomenon of the voices themselves. This was just the reverse of the estimate of the case formed by Mr. Parsons, for the latter regarded the phenomenon of the voices as the greater mystery.

Dr. X— stated that at his first sitting he was completely "taken off his feet, so to speak," and considered spirit communion as proven; but that upon subsequent occasions, he was sorry to state things had occurred to lessen this belief. He related many marvelous incidents of conversation with the voices, and stated that he had taken many friends to the lady under assumed names; yet he had never failed to hear the voices call these persons by their right names, etc. He also stated that the information furnished by Mrs. Blake's voices at times had seemed so marvelous that he had seriously contemplated referring her case to the Society for Psychical Research, in order that he might have an authoritative statement with regard to what her powers really consisted of. I quote a few extracts from many in his letters:

"Twenty-two years ago this summer, my father took me to Virginia for the purpose of entering me in college. I was an only child, had not been away from home a great deal, and was quite young; therefore he accompanied me to Blacksburg, Virginia, introduced me to the president of the school, and otherwise assisted me in getting started. It was a military school, and every new-comer was called a 'rat,' and this was yelled at him by the older students in chorus until it grated upon his nerves to a considerable extent.

"As my father and myself walked up towards the college buildings over the broad campus, the word 'rat' was yelled at us with depressing distinctness. We went across the campus and on beyond to a large grove of virgin forest, where we sat down upon a large log; and here my father gave me some paternal advice. He was going to leave the next morning and I felt very sad and lonely; and it was with great difficulty that I kept back the tears that in spite of myself would now and then trickle down my cheeks. At all of this my father laughed and said that I would be all right in a few days.

"When conversing through Mrs. Blake's trumpet with the supposed voice of my father, the following conversation with the voice occurred. I had previously written out the question and I have since added the answers of the voice:

"'Do you remember the time you took me off to college?' I asked.

"'Yes, as distinctly as if it had been yesterday,' the voice replied.

"'When we walked towards the building, what was said to me by some of the students?'

"'They yelled "Rat" at you.'

"'Spell that word,' I requested, as I desired no misunderstanding.

"'R-a-t,' spelled the voice.

"'Where did we go after leaving the campus and college buildings?' I next asked.

"'We went to a large grove near the college buildings and sat down upon a hickory log,' responded the voice.

"'What did I do and say while sitting on this log?'

"'You cried because I was going to leave you and go home,' answered the voice. All of this was wonderfully accurate, but I do not know whether or not the log was hickory."

In another letter he says: "On one occasion a voice supposed to be my grandfather's talked with me, and I asked it what had caused him to depart this life. Just previous to asking this question the voice had been full and strong; but upon asking it the voice became indistinct, and I concluded that my question had 'put the lady out of business.'? To my surprise, in a few minutes my grandfather commenced to talk again; and I reminded him that he had not answered my question. He replied by saying that I knew perfectly well what had caused him to depart this life, and that it was not necessary to ask such unimportant questions.

"I replied by stating that I wanted the question answered, in order that I might be convinced as to his identity; and also to know that he had sufficient consciousness and intelligence to reply. He then stated that the immediate cause of his death was a fracture of the skull.

"'How did this happen?' I asked.

"'By falling down a stairway,' answered the voice.

"'In Gallipolis, Ohio, in my son's house,' again responded the voice. All this was correct.

"I next asked my grandfather's voice if he remembered what he used to entertain me with when I was a child. He replied that he did; and that he had made little boats for me, and had floated them in a tub of water. I asked how old I was when this took place, and he replied that I was five years old. This was correct, and had occurred some thirty-four years ago."

Again Dr. X— says, "'In addition to her daylight work, Mrs. Blake gives dark seances. At these, the voice of her dead son Abe usually opens the meeting with prayer, and some hymns are sung by all present. During this time, numerous little blue lights flit about the room; the guitar is frequently floated over our heads, etc. After this, voices speak up in various parts of the room and address those present. I attended one of those night meetings recently.

"In addition to others present, I took with me Clara Mathers Bee, who had formerly been my stenographer, but whom I had not seen for five years. She was a total stranger to the others present, and resides at a remote point in the interior of the state. Mrs. Blake does not keep in touch with the whole state of West Virginia, and knew nothing of this lady.

"Mrs. Bee had recently lost a young lady cousin, and was very anxious to communicate with her. She even went so far in her inexperience as to call for this relative on several occasions, giving her name in full. This, however brought no results, although Mrs. Blake could have made use of the knowledge thus acquired. Finally, during an attempt to communicate with this relative, a child's voice spoke and said, 'I want to talk to my Aunt Clara.' It was some time before any one answered and no one seemed to understand for whom this was intended. Presently Mrs. Bee said, 'Do you want to talk to me?'

"'Yes, you are my Aunty Clara,' the voice replied.

"'What is your name?' asked Mrs. Bee.

"'My name is Stinson Bee,' answered the voice

"'How long has it been since you died?'

"'Six months.'

"'What caused you to leave this life?'

"'I was burned to death; and I want you to tell my papa that I want to talk to him,' responded the voice.

"In explanation I will state that Stinson Bee, who was a nephew of Mrs. Bee's husband, was burned to death six months before the time of this sitting. Mrs. Blake could not have known anything of this, as it happened in a remote part of the interior of the state; and as intimate as I am with the family, I did not know of it.

"Just at this point my father's voice broke into the conversation and said, 'How do you do, Clara?'

"'Do you know who this is that you are talking to?' I asked.

"'Yes, it is Clara Bee,' responded the voice.

"'That is correct, but what was her name before she was married?' I asked.

"'Don't you think I know Clara Mathers?' the voice replied."

These are but few of many incidents which Dr. X— has related to me in great seriousness. He is a well educated and highly respected gentleman, of the highest standing in his community. There are reasons why he does not desire his name used, and this is why I omit the name! but it can be had in private. In one letter he informed me that during the daylight sittings, Mrs. Blake first seats herself beside the sitter, each allowing the trumpet to rest with its ends in their adjacent palms. Soon the trumpet begins to grow heavy, and then finally, one end of it seems to attempt to move upward to the ear of the sitter. This means that conditions are right and that a voice desires to speak.

He further stated that close friends of Mrs. Blake who were in a position to know, informed him that of late Mrs. Blake was rapidly losing her powers; and that they were not nearly what they had previously been. He suggested, in case I contemplated an investigation that I make it as quickly as possible, for he said that her health was such that any sudden attack was liable to terminate her earthly career. He also suggested that I write nothing further to Mrs. Blake, and in no way let her know that I contemplated making such an extended journey to see her; as he had found results much better when she did not think she was being especially investigated. He thought I should simply act as if I had been passing and had merely stopped off on my journey.

After receiving these reports, I determined to investigate this case if possible. I wrote to Prof. James H. Hyslop, secretary of the American Society for Psychical Research, and detailed the case to him, asking if he would assist me. Meanwhile I wrote Mr. Parsons, and secured his permission to lay the matter before Professor Hyslop. I did not tell the latter the name or location of the lady, but explained that it was within one hundred miles of Cincinnati. Also, I wrote to Dr. X— that I would like to be informed if Mrs. Blake were at home and well, as I wished to come. He replied informing me that she was at that time visiting in the mountains; but that immediately upon her return, he would notify me. This he did; but she was suddenly taken sick on her return, and this prevented my making the journey. Dr. X—, however, stated that he would instantly inform me on the recovery of Mrs. Blake's strength, as soon as such should enable her to give sittings. He again urged

SOME EXCELLENT HINTS.

Mental Suggestion for Children.

The big stick in the home is doomed, for telepathy is the latest remedy for the faults of precocious youngsters. If you want to spare the pants as well as improve the child, just feed him on mental suggestions, for, according to Dr. Frederick Van Eeden, eminent physician and sociologist of Holland, hypno-suggestion is a sure cure for juvenile evils and ills.

"Parents can mold their children to be good or bad by suggestion," said the bearded wise man from the land of dikes and ditches to-day, in disclosing the secrets of how to raise a family on mental telepathy.

"The childish mind is impressionable, and a mother or father by verbal and mental suggestions forms either a worthy or wicked character for the child. If a little one is continually told that he is naughty, bad, incorrigible, he will grow to consider himself beyond redemption, and will make no effort to cultivate goodness. It is not the child's fault if he is naughty—it is the fault of the parents."

"Then a mother shouldn't blame her juenile boys if she finds them besmirched with jam, for she's the one who is really to blame for not having her mental wires working?" I inquired of Dr. Von Eeden.

"Yes, stealing jam and other offense can be stopped by thought transmissions," the doctor answered.

"Every home should be conducted along the lines of mental suggestion, for it is only then that harmony can exist throughout the household.

"I have watched the effort of mental suggestion on children for more than twenty years," he acknowledged, "for I have brought up my family in that manner. I know its value, and the mother who is wise will take my advice and employ mental suggestion in bringing up her family."

"But the American mother isn't an adept at the art of sending mental messages. I am afraid she would need a special course in telepathy before she could transmit thoughts to her children.

"A school for parents might be organized," laughingly suggested Dr. Van Eeden, "where mothers and fathers could be taught proper methods for governing their children. Seriously speaking, a much finer race of men could be reared if parents only realized how greatly the child is influenced by thought. It is by suggesting good that good is produced, by mentally determining that the child shall be all that is fine, that he ultimately develops a superior character. It is the same in regard to health. Parents constantly endanger the health of their little ones by asking whether they feel sick, as the reiteration of this question suggests illness to the children's mind which in time actually causes illness.

"When the child is drowsy just before retiring is the best time for the mother or father to transmit thought. Its mind is more receptive and it responds more easily to ideas."

"Is the same true of adults, and are they open to mental suggestion?"

"Assuredly yes," Dr. Van Eeden quickly said, "though not to such a large degree. Until one is twenty the mind is very impressionable and it is during those years that parents should use mental suggestion. After that the character is formed for good or bad and it is hard to change it. A man's early training makes or mars him. And it is for this reason that parents can not be too careful in influencing their children by mental suggestion."—Rose C. Tillotson, in St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

INSPIRATION.

From earth to heaven, by Jacob seen of old,
Earth was its footstool, heaven its resting place,
Who broke its span? No history hath yet told,
And angels yet descend, for God withholds no grace.

He grants his children yet a higher light,
No lock nor bar resists his tender key.
Fair science maketh frail, weak hands a might,
To break earth's fetters, bare life's mysteries.

Beloved forms ye see with mortal eyes,
On earth no more, descend and gladness bring,
And rung by rung, uplift ye toward the skies,
Till earth shall list and hear the joybells ring.

"Peace on earth, good will, good will to man,"
Falls down this pathway, borne on heavenly winds,
And earth uplooking hears this sweet command,
"Come upto me, I wipe away all stains."

"And I am Truth, in whatsoever mold,
Ye grant me audience, or uplift my staff,
Ye still partake, as Jacob did of old,
From love's sweet fountain, life's deep waters quaff."

E. M. M.

Those who have not tried for themselves can hardly imagine how much science adds to the interest and variety of life. It is altogether a mistake to regard it as dry, difficult, or prosaic—much of it is as easy as it is interesting. * * * Occasionally, indeed, science may destroy some poetical myth of antiquity, such as the ancient Hindoo explanation of rivers, that "Indra dug out their beds with his thunderbolts, and sent them forth by long continuous paths;" but the real causes of natural phenomena are far more striking and contain more true poetry than those which have occurred to the untrained imagination of mankind.—Sir John Lubbock.

A Study in Occultism.

me not to delay, if I desired results of value, stating that undoubtedly her powers would soon be gone.

Meanwhile, Professor Hyslop met a lady from that section of the country, who told him of "a wonderful medium, Mrs. Blake near Huntington, West Virginia." Professor Hyslop then wrote me that he thought he had discovered the identity of the lady, and asked me if this were she. I wrote in reply that it was. I mailed the letter from Omaha to Professor Hyslop, who was then in New York at Hurricane Lodge on the Hudson. In just two days after mailing the letter, I received a telegram from Prof. Hyslop, saying, "I start for Huntington to-night."

Now, I did not desire any one to arrive on the scene ahead of myself; for I wanted to thoroughly satisfy my own curiosity. I therefore immediately telegraphed Dr. X— at Huntington as follows: "Professor Hyslop wires his starting. Shall I come?" In an hour I received this reply, "Just as well now as any time." During the wait I called up by telephone, my cousin, Geo. W. Clawson, of Kansas City, Mo., to whom I had previously described the case, and induced him to accompany me. So far I had not revealed to him where we were going, except that it was beyond Cincinnati. Mr. Clawson had a short time before lost a daughter whose Christian name was Georgia Chastine, and was very greatly grieved over her demise. It was the hope of obtaining some proof of a future life through communication with her that caused him to yield and to go with me.

The next morning I took the train for Kansas City, where I was joined by Mr. Clawson; and we started on our one-thousand-mile journey. I asked Mr. Clawson to choose a name to travel under, and to keep his real name secret, as I wanted no possibility of deception in my investigation. The name he chose was "C. E. Wilson," that of a friend of his. He made the journey under this name and registered under it at the Florentine Hotel.

I had resided for a few years in Omaha, but was not generally known there. My parents reside at the village of Falls City, Neb., and are well known there. I knew that, should my friend, Dr. X— desire to do so, it would be possible for him to employ some one in advance to obtain information in regard to my relatives and family. I regarded him with far too much respect to think such a thing would happen; but in order to remove all possibility of fraud, I desired to take with me an unknown person under an assumed name. This was why I decided on Mr. Clawson. I did not reveal my intention to any one.

I had previously written to Dr. X— that I was liable to bring an unknown person with me, but I gave him no idea of who this person would be. I did not think that any one would be able to reach out through space one thousand miles and read my mind, discover whom I intended taking, and then look up his history in advance. I considered Mr. Clawson a desirable person to go with me, as both of his parents were dead; and also on account of his great desire to communicate with his dead daughter, if such a thing were possible. He also had a brother by the name of "Edward," who had died when quite young, and a son who had died within a few days of birth However, these last two instances I did not know until after our sittings. The reader should remember these facts and names, on account of what is to follow. I did not expect results of much consequence to myself, owing to the fact that I have no immediate dead, with the exception of two baby brothers, my grandparents and some uncles and aunts. I therefore could not expect to receive results of much importance, whatever the power of the lady might be. We journeyed continuously for two nights and a day, arriving at Huntington in the early morning hours of Monday, July 23, 1906.

III.

About eight o'clock that morning I telephoned to Dr. X— that I had arrived with a friend. The Doctor resided in a beautiful park a short distance in the country. He soon arrived at our hotel with his carriage; and I introduced my friend, Mr. C. E. Wilson (Mr. Clawson, under his assumed name), to him. The Doctor then drove us to his residence for a short time. He showed us a copy of a letter to Mrs. Blake which he had dictated, a few days before, and which stated that he expected two friends from New York to visit him; and that he wished to take them to see her, and he hoped she would receive them and do the best she could, even if not entirely recovered from her recent illness. He did not give any names in his letter; and he assured me that, since the time of answering my letter to Mrs. Blake at the beginning of our correspondence, he had never mentioned my name to her.

To the Doctor himself, I was a total stranger, with the exception of what he had learned of me in my letters to him, and also what information he had gleaned from my article, "Some Mediumistic Phenomena," before referred to. The Doctor had in his possession one of Mrs. Blake's double trumpets. We examined this thoroughly; and taking it we drove to the Ohio river, and crossed in a row-boat to Braderick, Ohio. This village consists of about one dozen cottages situated along the river bank. It was about ten o'clock in the forenoon, and Professor Hyslop had not yet arrived, the night boat on which he journeyed down the Hudson having been delayed. We went up the bank and turned to the left to Mrs. Blake's cottage. The ferry landing is close to her house, and most of its patronage seems to come from her visitors.

Mr. Blake was sitting on the porch and he received us. He informed us that he had just turned away a number of persons who desired sittings with Mrs. Blake, and that she could not receive us professionally. However, we were not to be dismissed in this manner, and we refused to leave without at least seeing her. Mr. Blake then told us we might enter, while he remained outside to turn away visitors. We entered the little parlor; Dr. X— stepped through the open doorway and spoke to Mrs. Blake, telling her he had two friends with him whom he wished to bring in. She readily consented and we entered.

She was sitting in a large rocker by the window in her little room. Her crutches were by her side, and she seemed a very pleasing, though elderly and frail lady. We were introduced merely as "friends," and we conversed with her for a few moments. She said she was born and had resided all of her life within two and one-half miles of her present home. She explained that she had possessed her power since a child. She said that as a little girl she had heard voices in her ears, and that some gentleman had experimented with her. He found that a closed receptacle confined the sounds and made the words clearer. After this, the present trumpet had been devised, but she could use any closed receptacle. She said that since her sickness, she had lost her power, so that she could "get nothing satisfactory any more." She said that her power was declining so rapidly that she felt she would have to give up the business entirely. She expressed her willingness to try, but stated that she could not satisfy any one now like she used to do when her health was better. Meanwhile, her husband kept coming in and going out, as if he were watching her closely to prevent her giving a sitting. She, herself seemed very accommodating; and I felt assured that, but for him, we could conduct some interesting experiments. Finally Dr. X— went out and talked to him, and succeeded in securing his consent for a short trial.

Mr. Clawson now seated himself beside the lady, and she instructed him to take one end of the trumpet in his palm, while she did the same with the other end.

In a moment Mr. Clawson remarked: "How heavy that is getting!" and as he did so, I thought I heard a faint whisper in the end of the trumpet that Mr. Clawson was holding. It was, however, so faint that I could not be certain of it. It was more like a single syllable, the drawing of a breath, or like a hissing sound, but it was very indistinct. In a moment the trumpet began to rise toward Mr. Clawson's ear, and the lady said, "Some one wants to speak to you, sir; place the trumpet to your ear." He did so, and she placed the other end to her ear.

Whispered voices in the trumpet now began to address Mr. Clawson, but from the outside I could not understand what was said. Mr. Clawson seemed unable to do much better, and it appeared that the sitting would prove a failure on this account. Mrs. Blake now spoke and said, "Please try and speak plainly, dear friend, so that the gentleman can understand you." The voice now seemed to become more distinct, and Mr. Clawson asked the question, "Who are you?" He did not appear to understand the reply, for he repeated his question a few times, as one does at a poorly-working telephone. Finally I heard him say, "You say you are my brother, Eddie?" Mr. Clawson seemed confused at being unable to understand the many whispered words in the spoken sentences; and turning to me, he said, "You take the trumpet and see if you can understand any better."

I may here remark that up to this time I did not know that Mr. Clawson had a dead brother "Edward," and that I supposed this to be an error until afterwards. During the time that the voices were speaking, Mrs. Blake's lips were tightly closed, and there was no motion of them. She appeared to be listening intently to the voices, and trying to follow the conversation.

I now took the trumpet. A voice spoke a lengthy sentence, or more, which was so inarticulate that I could not understand it. Finally I heard the words, "Can't you hear me?"

"Yes. Who are you?" I replied.

"I am your brother and I want to talk to mother. Tell her...," responded the voice, the last words becoming indistinct.

"What shall I tell her?" I asked. The voice then took the tone of a child's voice, low, and almost vocal, and said, "Tell her that I love her."

The only dead brother that I have, who was old enough to talk before his death, was named "Thomas." He was two years older than I, and three years old at death. I now said, "Give me your name." The voice then repeated an inarticulate name many times, but I could not understand it. It appeared to sound like "Artie" or "Arthur." In fact it sounded first like one, and then like the other would sound, were I to try to whisper them in an inarticulate manner. I did not repeat these names, and the voice gave up the attempt. I now handed the trumpet to Mr. Clawson, and the voice kept repeating, "I want to talk to my brother," so he gave the trumpet back to me.

"Whom do you want to talk to?" I asked.

"I want to talk to my brother Davie—brother Davie Abbott," responded the voice. I could hear the name "Abbott" repeated several times after this, and then voice finally ceased.

Mr. Clawson now took the trumpet. I may remark that although Mr. Clawson's parents, and also a little son who was never named, were dead, his whole heart was set on obtaining a communication from his daughter, Georgia, who had recently died; and unless he could do this, the whole sitting was a failure as far as he was concerned. This daughter had been very affectionate, and had always called her mother by the pet names of "Muz" and "Muzzie." She also generally called her father "Daddie," in a playful way. She had recently graduated from a school of dramatic art, and while there had become affianced to a young gentleman whose Christian name is "Archimedes." He is usually called "Ark" for short. Mr. Clawson had these facts in mind, intending to use them as a matter of identification.

A voice now addressed Mr. Clawson, saying, "I am your brother."

"Who else is there? Any of my relatives?" asked Mr. Clawson.

"Your mother is here," responded the voice.

"Who else is there?"

"Your baby."

"Let the baby speak and give its name," requested Mr. Clawson.

This was followed by many indistinct words that could not be understood. Finally a name was pronounced that Mr. Clawson understood to be "Edna." He had no child of that name; but in what followed, although his lips addressed the name "Edna," his whole mind addressed his daughter, "Georgia."

"Edna, if you are my daughter, tell me what was your pet name for me?" he asked.

"I called you Daddie," the voice replied.

"What was your pet name for your mother?"

"I called her Muz, and sometimes Muzzie," responded the voice.

"What is my name?" asked Mr. Clawson, but the reply was so indistinct that it could not be understood.

I now took the trumpet, but received nothing satisfactory—merely inarticulate words. Soon I was quite sure that I heard a voice announcing, "This is Grandma Daily." My grandmother on my mother's side was Mrs. Daily; but as she had always called me "Davie" as a child, and as the names "Daily" and "Davie," when whispered, sound very similar, I decided that possibly the voice had whispered, "This is Grandma, Davie." I did not wish to misinterpret sounds and thus aid the lady, and I desired to be very certain of all of my tests; so I did not repeat the name "Daily," as most persons would have done. I waited, expecting the voice to pronounce the name unmistakably.

A number of inarticulate sentences which I could not understand were now spoken. However, among the words I heard first the name "Harvey," and then "Dave." After this I heard the name "Dave Harvey." Next, I heard the initials "J. A.," and I also heard a name that seemed to be "Asa." I have an uncle who is dead, and whose name was "Richard Harvey." The name of his son who is now living is "David Harvey." An uncle of mine who is dead was called by the name of "Asa," but his name had been given in my article referred to before. I have a living brother whose initials are "J. A."

Mr. Clawson now took the trumpet and attempted to talk to some inarticulate voices. Finally a voice said, "I am Grandma."

"Grandma who?" asked Mr. Clawson. I could not understand the reply; but I heard Mr. Clawson repeat, "Grandma Daily?" with a rising inflection. He then turned to me and said, "This is pretty good. The voice says that Grandma Daily is here."

At this point Mrs. Blake terminated the sitting, claiming that her strength was leaving her. It had lasted probably twenty minutes. At one time Mrs. Blake had turned her back to me so as to use her other ear. At this point her face was next to the wall, and I could not see her lips; but I thought I detected a twitching of the muscles of the throat. The sounds were really in the trumpeet, and there was no doubt that they did not issue from the nose or mouth of Mrs. Blake.

A few times during the sitting she took the trumpet from her ear, allowing it to rest in her palm. This would be for an instant at a time. During such time there was no cessation of the voices in the trumpet; but the fingers of her hand that were over the end of it seemed to be separated. At such times the voices seemed to originate at her hand, and were not so distinct as usual. When the trumpet was at her ear they seemed to originate there.

After the sitting, we told Mrs. Blake that we had a friend who would arrive on the next train. We stated that we very earnestly desired him to meet her, and finally she agreed that we should bring him and return in the evening. Then we presented her with a neat sum (as we desired her best services), and took our departure.

We crossed the river, returned to the home of our friend, Dr. X—, and then sent a driver to the train to see if Prof. Hyslop would arrive. Mr. Clawson went with the Doctor's driver to the train. In a short time they returned, bringing Professor Hyslop with them. Immediately after noon we dictated to the Doctor's stenographer a concise account of our morning sitting. It is from these records made at the time that this account is taken. Each of us dictated separately all that he could remember. We then compared our reports and corrected them.

A little later in the afternoon, we drove to the river again and crossed to Mrs. Blake's cottage. We were received, and had quite an interesting conversation with her. During this time Professor Hyslop questioned her minutely about the history of her case. We desired a sitting, but she declined to give us both a daylight and a dark seance; so we waited a few moments, as it was rapidly growing dark; and we then had a dark sitting, intending to have a daylight sitting the following day day if possible. Mrs. Blake agreed to this, and said if her strength did not fail her, she would give us a sitting the following morning.

It now became quite dark and we arranged ourselves around a small table. We were conversing at the time; and having my mind intently on her work, I thoughtlessly said to Mr. Clawson, "Mr. Cla—, take this seat." The others were talking at the time, I was not speaking loudly, and I discovered my error in time to omit the last syllable. I was quite sure that it was not noticed at the time, but this fact must be remembered.

Mrs. Blake sat on my left, and Professor Hyslop sat on her left. At the opposite end of the table sat Dr. X— and his brother-in-law, who had just happened to come in. Mr. Clawson sat at one side of the room, holding the hand of Mr. Blake. Professor Hyslop and myself declined to hold the hands of Mrs. Blake, as we cared nothing whatever for physical manifestations, but desired only mental phenomena, which would be of the same value whether given in darkness or in light.

We sat a very long time, and it seemed that nothing was to occur. Finally a blue light floated over the table between us, and another appeared near the floor close to where Mr. Clawson and Mr. Blake were sitting. The trumpet on the table was also lifted up over my head and dropped to the floor by my side.

Finally, the deep-toned voice of a man spoke. It appeared to be about a foot above and behind Mrs. Blake's head. The voice was melodious, soft, low in pitch, and very distinct. This is the voice that is claimed to be that of her dead son, Abe. There was a note of sadness in it, and it spoke these words: "My friends, I am sorry to say that owing to my mother's weak condition, it will be impossible for us to give any manifestations that will be worth anything this eveng. We deeply regret this, but it is beyond our power to give you anything of value, as she is very weak."

It is hardly necessary to say that we refused to take this statement for a dismissal, but continued to remain. In a short time we heard a man's voice of a different tone entirely, which Dr. X— recognized as the voice of his grandfather. These voices were open, —that is, they were in no trumpet and were vocal. The tone of this last voice was that of a very old man, and the conversation was commonplace. Soon a much more robust and powerful man's voice spoke, and said: "James, we will give way to the others." This voice Dr. X— recognized as the usual voice which claimed to be that of his father.

A lady's voice now addressed Professor Hyslop, and some little conversation was carried on, but with no satisfactory results. I now reached down to the floor, and taking the trumpet, placed one end to my ear and gave the other end to Mrs. Blake. The voices issuing from it could be heard by the other persons present. The first voice appeared to be that of a girl, so I handed the trumpet to Mr. Clawson. The voice said, "Don't you know me, Daddie?"

"Who are you, Edna?" asked Mr. Clawson.

"Why, you know me, Daddie," answered the voice.

"Are you Edna Jackson?" asked Mr. Clawson. This was the name of a dead friend of his daughter.

"You know I am not Edna Jackson," responded the voice.

"If you are my daughter, tell me where mamma is."

"At home."

"Yes, but where?" insisted Mr. Clawson. The reply to this was inarticulate, but resembled "Kansas City," which was the correct place.

"Is she in St. Louis?" he asked.

"You know she is not," the voice replied.

"Is she in St. Joe?"

"No, no. She is in — — —," replied the voice. The first words were given with great energy and were almost vocal, but the last words were inarticulate. The latter, however, resembled "Kansas City." I then asked the voice to repeat the name, but it grew so weak that I could not distinguish the words. So far, everything was entirely unsatisfactory, and we were greatly discouraged.

I now took the trumpet. That the reader may fully understand what is to follow, I shall state a few facts. My Grandmother Daily, in the latter part of her life, resided in the country in Andrew County, Missouri. There my mother grew up. My grandmother died thirteen years ago. My mother's maiden name was "Sarah Frances Daily." She was always known to all as "Fannie Daily," and where she now resides is known to every one as "Fannie Abbott." Even Mr. Clawson did not then know her correct Christian name. My eldest sister, Ada, who is now Mrs. Humphrey, was residing in the village of Verdon, Nebraska. She and I as children, used to visit our grandmother, Mrs. Daily, and we were great favorites with her. She always called my sister "Adie," and myself "Davie." This was many years ago.

A voice in the trumpet now addressed me, claiming to be that of my grandmother, Mrs. Daily.

"Well, grandma, what do you wish to say?" I asked.

"Davie, I love you, and I am all right. It is all right Davie, it is all right; and I want you to tell your mother that you talked to me, and tell your father, too," said the voice.

"You want me to tell my mother and my father that you talked to me?" I repeated, hardly knowing what to say.

"Yes, Davie, and tell Adie, too," replied the voice very plainly. "Tell whom?" I asked, being greatly surprised, as this came upon me like a gleam of light out of a chasm of darkness.

"Tell Adie, too," the voice again repeated. It certainly seemed incredible that this voice could manifest such intimate knowledge of my family's names, one thousand miles away. I thereupon decided to further test this knowledge.

"Grandma, what relation is Ada to me?" I quickly asked.

"Why, sister Adie, Davie. Tell sister Adie. You know what I mean—tell sister Adie." This had come so suddenly that I was for a moment dumfounded; but I quickly decided to ask a test question that I did not think the voice could answer.

"Grandma, now if this is really you talking to me, you know my mother's first name. Tell it to me," I said.

"Sarah," answered the voice, quick as a flash. It was so quickly answered that the name "Sarah" had not entered my own consciousness at the instant. I had asked the test question so very quickly, that I had given all of my thought to the question, and none to the correct answer; and I had dimly in my consciousness only the name "Fannie." Thus the name "Sarah" really momentarily surprised me, and I had to think a mere instant before I realized that it was correct. I did not repeat the name for fear of a misinterpretation of sounds.

"What do you say it is?" I again asked.

"Sarah," again the voice plainly responded. There could be no mistake, but I did not repeat the name as most would have done.

"Mrs. Blake, what do you understand that name to be?" I asked, turning to her.

"Why, it sounds like Sary," she replied. I then conceived the idea of having the voice give the first names of Mrs. Daily's other children, but it here disappeared. I ask the reader to substitute himself for the writer, and for the names "Ada" and "Sarah," to substitute names in his own family; and then to go over the foregoing dialogue, using these substituted names; to imagine himself in a strange country among strangers, and then to note the peculiar effect upon himself. He will then understand the peculiar subjective effect that this had upon the writer. A gentleman's voice now spoke inarticulately.

"Let my uncle come," I said.

"Let our mutual uncle come," spoke Mr. Clawson. This question, conveying within itself our relationship, being spoken, I now said, "Yes, let our mutual uncle come."

"Well, I am here," spoke a man's voice near the table top in a few moments.

"If you are our uncle, give us your name," I requested.

"Dave, I am Uncle Dave," now spoke the voice. We had an uncle whose Christian name was "David Patterson," and who was dead.

"If you are Uncle Dave, tell me your second name," I requested. The voice pronounced a name that resembled "Parker." It began with the letter "P," but we could not understand what followed.

"Dave, you were named after me," continued the voice.

"What is your last name?" I asked. This was "Abbott;" but the voice replied with an inarticulate sentence, in which we distinguished the name "Harvey." My uncle Richard Harvey and the uncle whose voice this purported to be, were quite intimate many years ago.

One remarkable feature of the voice which claimed to be that of my uncle David, was that it resembled his voice when alive, to an extent sufficient to call to my mind a mental picture of his appearance; and for an instant to give me that inner feeling of his presence that hearing a well-known voice always produces in one. I said nothing of this at the time. I may say that during all of our sittings, no other voice bore any resemblance to the voice of the person to whom it claimed to belong, so far as I was able to detect. As this uncle had died only a few years before, I have a vivid remembrance of his voice.

THE PSYCHOGRAPH

OR

Dial Planchette.

This instrument is substantially the same as that employed by Prof. Hare in his early investigations. In its improved form it has been before the public for more than twelve years, and in the hands of thousands of persons has proved its superiority over the Planchette, and all other instruments which have been brought out in imitation, both in regard to certainty and correctness of the communications received by its aid, and as a means of developing mediumship.

Do you wish to investigate Spiritualism?
Do you wish to develop Mediumship?
Do you desire to receive communications?

The Psychograph is an invaluable assistant. A pamphlet with full directions for the FORMATION OF CIRCLES AND CULTIVATION OF MEDIUMSHIP with every instrument. Many who were not aware of their mediumistic gift, have, after a few sittings, been able to receive delightful messages. A volume might be filled with commendatory letters. Many who began with it as an amusing toy, found that the intelligence controlling it knew more than themselves, and became converts to Spiritualism.

Capt D. B. Edwards, Orient, N. Y., writes: "I had communications (by the Psychograph) from many other friends, even from old settlers whose gravestones are moss-grown in the old yard. They have been highly satisfactory, and proved to me that Spiritualism is indeed true, and the communications have given my heart the greatest comfort in the severest loss I have had of son, daughter, and their mother."

Dr. Eugene Crowell, whose writings have made his name familiar to those interested in psychic matters, writes as follows: "I am much pleased with the Psychograph. It is very simple in principle and construction, and I am sure must be far more sensitive to spiritual power than the one now in use. I believe it will generally supersede the latter when its superior merits become known."

Germs of Mind in Plants

By R. H. France, Translated by A. M. Simons.—Cloth, Illustrated, 50 Cents.

A cardinal point in the philosophical systems favored by the ruling classes is that the mind of man is something unique in the universe, governed by laws of its own that have no particular connection with physical laws. Modern science has proved that not only animals, but also plants receive impressions from the outside world and use data thus obtained to modify their movements for their own advantage, exactly as human beings do. These facts are told in this book in so charming and entertaining a style that the reader is carried along and does not realize until later the revolutionary significance of the facts.

A Study in Occultism.

We now asked permission to return the following morning. Mr. Blake agreed to go to a telephone on the following morning and to "call up" Dr. X— and to inform him if Mrs. Blake were well enough to receive us. We now took our departure. When crossing the river in the darkness I asked Professor Hyslop if he had heard any "slip of the tongue." Dr. X—spoke up and said that he had, but that he thought that Mrs. Blake did not hear it. Mr. Clawson now incautiously spoke and said, "Well, it doesn't matter. I do not care who knows who I am. I am George Clawson of Kansas City, and there is no use to conceal it." He was so disappointed at getting nothing definite from his daughter "Georgia," that he forgot his discretion. While still on the river Mr. Clawson spoke to me and said, "Did you notice how that voice sounded like Uncle Dave's when it first spoke?" I replied that I did, but that I had thought it to be partly my own imagination. The other parties in the boat will remember this conversation.

The following morning Mr. Blake telephoned our friend, and announced his willingness to receive us. As soon as we had dictated our reports of the previous evening, Professor Hyslop, Mr. Clawson, and myself started for Mrs. Blake's house. Dr. X— did not accompany us, but remained at home to attend to other duties. We arrived at the cottage in due time, and found Mrs. Blake in excellent spirits and much improved physically. A little granddaughter of Mrs. Blake's was playing in the street and entered with us. This pretty little child was but four years of age and seemed a great favorite with her grandmother.

Mrs. Blake informed us that this child was developing a power just like her own. We asked her for a demonstration. Professor Hyslop took the little child on his lap, and I gave her one end of the trumpet. Immediately whisperings in the trumpet could be heard, but I could understand nothing except the question, "Can you hear me?"

Mrs. Blake now took the trumpet. She and I allowed its two ends to rest in our palms for a few moments. Soon it rolled on our palms one-half of a revolution. I now heard a syllable of a vocal voice which appeared to originate near the end of the trumpet in Mrs. Blake's hand. I placed the trumpet to my ear, but could understand nothing. In a short time the inarticulate voice seemed to have changed to the whisperings of a lady. Finally, Mrs. Blake said, "I believe they want to talk to you, sir." This remark was addressed to Mr. Clawson, whose identity, so far as we knew, was entirely unknown to Mrs. Blake. She makes it a rule to ask no questions, and apparently scorns being given any information, even to the name of her sitter. Up to this time Mr. Clawson had been standing very close to Mrs. Blake and intently watching her. I noticed this and feared it would embarrass her. I now surrendered the trumpet to Mr. Clawson. I seated myself so that I could hold my right ear against the middle of the trumpet, and I faced Mr. Clawson, thus carelessly turning my back upon Mrs. Blake.

Instantly the voice appeared exceedingly loud and strong, and I could understand the words from the outside with perfect clearness. I will mention the fact that from this time forward, in about one-half of Mr. Clawson's tests, I could understand the words from the outside of the trumpet and thus assure myself that he did not misinterpret the sounds. In other tests I had to trust entirely to his sense of hearing and his own discretion.

"Who is this?" asked Mr. Clawson.

"Grandma Daily," responded the voice.

"How do you do, George? I used to know you, didn't I?" asked Mr. Clawson.

"How do you do, George? I want to talk to Davie," responded the voice. "I can hear you from here, Grandma," I said from my position beside the trumpet.

"He gives her strength; that is why she speaks so much stronger now," said Mrs. Blake, indicating Mr. Clawson.

"Keep your position. I can hear her from here," I said to Mr. Clawson.

"Grandma, tell me the names of some of those big boys of yours," requested Mr. Clawson. Here some inarticulate words could be heard, but could not be understood.

I must state that I have a living aunt by the name of Mrs. Benight, who is a daughter of my Grandmother Daily. She resides in the country in Buchanan County, Missouri, and is not known far from home. Practically all of her life has been spent within a radius of a few miles from there. Her first name is "Melissa," but she has always been known by the name of "Lissie." At the time of this sitting Mr. Clawson did not know of this aunt, but he did know of her dead sister, Mrs. Cora Holt. This he had learned from my Open Court article referred to before. It was this last name that Mr. Clawson had in mind during what followed.

"Grandma, tell me the first name of one of your daughters," requested Mr. Clawson.

"— — —." The reply I could not understand from the outside.

"Lizzie?—Lizzie?—You say Lizzie?" asked Mr. Clawson. I could hear the reply between each of these questions, but could not understand it. After the sitting when crossing the river, I asked Mr. Clawson about this incident. He said that name seemed undoubtedly to be "Lizzie," but that the letter "z" seemed more of the sound of "s." Up to this moment, strange to say, the name "Lissie" had not occurred to me; but when he spoke of the sound of the letters, I immediately thought of this aunt and informed him of her. I then learned that he did not know of her.

"What is the name of Dave's mother?" now asked Mr. Clawson.

"Sarah," answered the voice.

"Yes, but she has another name. What is her other name?" asked Mr. Clawson.

"Daily."

"That is not what I mean. She has another name. What do I call her when I speak to her? I call her by some other name. What do I call her?" insisted Mr. Clawson.

"Aunt Fannie. Don't you think I know my own daughter's name, George?" plainly spoke the voice, so that I could understand the words outside.

"I know you do, Grandma, but I wanted to ask you for the sake of proving your identity," continued Mr. Clawson.

"I want Davie to tell his mother and his father that he talked to me, that I am all right, and I don't want him to forget it. Davie, I want you to be good and pray, and meet me over here," continued the voice, speaking plainly so that I could hear outside.

As I write these lines there comes before my eyes a vision. I am looking back through the vista of the years. I see an old-fashioned homestead in the hills of Missouri. There is a grassy yard and the great trees cast their shadows on the sward. The sunlight is glinting down through the leaves, and an aged lady stands at the door. Her form is stooped; and her withered hand, which trembles violently, is supported by a cane. The tears are streaming down her cheeks, for she knows it is the last time she will look upon the youth who stands before her. Before the lady lies but the darkness of the approaching night. Before the youth stretches the waving green fields of the future, lighted by the sunlight of hope. Each knows it to be the last parting on earth, for the lady is very feeble. Her trembling hand clings to mine, while with tears streaming down her aged cheeks she says these words: "Davie, be good and pray, and meet me in heaven." I turn from her, a choking sensation in my throat, and I hurry to the old-fashioned gate. I can not trust myself to speak; but I look back at her, and she is watching me as far as her dim eyes can see. Then she slowly totters back to her lonely room.

The vision has vanished. It lingers but in the mists of memory. The dear old grandmother sleeps these many years in the grave-yard; the youth has grown to manhood, the snows of approaching winter already glisten in his hair, and the fleeting years are hurrying all too quickly.

With the exception of the words "over here" in place of the word "heaven," these last words spoken by the voice were the identical words which my grandmother spoke to me the last time I ever heard her voice. But I must not write this article to express sentiment, neither must I permit it to interpret facts. I must merely report what occurred with sacred accuracy.

Just after the last words spoken by my grandmother's supposed voice, the loud voice of a man broke into the conversation. It was vocal in tone, low in pitch, and had a weird effect.

"How do you do?" said the voice.

"How do you do, sir? Who are you?" asked Mr. Clawson.

"Grandpa," replied the voice.

"Grandpa who?" asked Mr. Clawson.

"Grandpa Abbott," said the voice, and it repeated, hurriedly, a name that sounded like "David Abbott;" and then the voice expired with a sound as of some one choking or strangling, as it went off dimly and vanished. "David" was my grandfather Abbott's Christian name.

Now, while they were resting, I determined to offer a suggestion to the lady indirectly, and to note what the effect would be. Turning to Mr. Clawson, but not calling him by name, I remarked, "It is strange that those we want so much do not come; that your daughter, to whom you would rather talk than to any one, does not speak to you. You have evidently talked to her, and she seems to identify herself; but is it not strange that she does not give her name correctly?" I said this in order to convey to the lady the fact that the name which appeared to be "Edna" was not the correct name of the gentleman's daughter.

When next he raised the trumpet to his ear a whispered voice said, "Daddie, I am here."

"Who are you?" asked Mr. Clawson.

"Georgia," replied the voice.

"Georgia? Georgia, is this really you?" asked Mr. Clawson, with intense emotion and earnestness.

"Yes, Daddie. Didn't you think I knew my own name?" asked the voice.

"I thought you did, Georgia, but could not understand why you would not tell it to me. Where do we live, Georgia?"

"In Kansas City," responded the voice, and the continued, "Daddie, I am so glad to talk to you, and so glad you came here to see me. I wish you could see my beautiful home. We have flowers and music every day."

"Georgia what is the name of your sweetheart to whom you were engaged?" now asked Mr. Clawson.

"— — —." The reply could not be understood.

"Georgia, spell the name," requested Mr. Clawson.

"A-r-c, Ark," responded the voice, spelling out the letters and then pronouncing the name.

"Give me his full name, Georgia," requested Mr. Clawson.

"Archimedes," now responded the voice.

"Will you spell the name for me?" asked Mr. Clawson, who wished to prevent a misinterpretation of the sounds.

"A-r-c-h-i-m-e-d-e-s," spelled the voice.

"Where is Ark, Georgia?" now asked Mr. Clawson. The reply could not be understood, but an inarticulate sentence was spoken ending with a word which sounded like "Denver."

"Do you say he is in Denver, Georgia?" asked Mr. Clawson.

"No, no," responded the voice loudly and almost vocally, and then continued, "He is in New York." This, Mr. Clawson afterwards informed me, was correct; but he thought the gentleman was at the time out of New York City, though somewhere in that state.

"Daddie, I want to tell you something. Ark is going to marry another girl," now continued the voice.

"Georgia, you say Ark is going to marry another girl?" asked Mr. Clawson.

"Yes, Daddie, but it's all right. It's all right now. He does not love her as he did me, but it is all right. I do not care now. I would like to talk to Muzzie," continued the voice.

Here a voice, vocal in tone and of the depth of man's, broke into the conversation. Mr. Clawson, who could not restrain his tears, owing to the intense dramatic effect of the recent conversation, stepped for an instant into the adjoining room to obtain control of his emotions, and to recover his self-possession.

I placed the trumpet to my ear and the man's voice said, "I want to talk to Davie. Davie, do you know me?"

"No. Who are you?" I replied.

"Grandpa Daily, Davie. Tell your mother that I talked to you, Davie."

"You want me to tell my mother you talked to me?" I asked.

"Yes, and tell your father, too," responded the voice. Mr. Clawson had by this time returned to the room; and, impetuously seizing the trumpet from my hand and placing it to his ear, exclaimed, "Hello, Grandpa! I used to know you, didn't I?"

"Of course you did," responded the voice.

"Who am I, Grandpa?"

"Oh, I know you well. You are George Clawson. I know you well." This response of the voice was just as loud and plain as if a gentleman were in the room conversing with us.

"Grandpa, tell us the name of that river we used to cross when we went over to your house?" now asked Mr. Clawson.

The voice answered inarticulately; and although the question was repeated several times, no response could be obtained that could be understood. The river is known as "The Hundred-and-Two." If a correct answer had been given, we should have considered it quite evidential. The voice gradually grew weaker; and then a lady's voice spoke and apparently addressed Professor Hyslop. The latter gentleman took the trumpet; but the words were weak, being mere whispers, and nothing definite could be understood.

Mrs. Blake then said, "We can't understand you. Now please give way to those who can speak more loudly." I now took the trumpet and a gentleman's voice addressed me in vocal tones. I asked who was speaking, and the voice responded, "Grandpa Abbott." I now asked the voice to give me my father's name. This it was unable to do. However, it pronounced an inarticulate name that resembled "Alexander." The first two letters were certainly "A" and "L," but we could not be certain of that which followed. Mr. Clawson tried to get a response, but could do no better, and the voice grew weak. My father's full Christian name is "George Alexander." Mr. Clawson knew his middle initial; but until after all of our sittings, did not know for what it stood.

"Here another loud, vocal, gentleman's voice spoke and said, "Gentlemen, you will have to excuse my mother. Her strength is exhausted." This voice was identical with the one of the evening before, which claimed to be that of her son Abe.

During the sitting, at one time, when the trumpet lay in the lap and while Mrs. Blake was conversing in her natural tones, the short guttural syllable of a gentleman's voice spoke, at what seemed afterwards to be the same instant that she was speaking. I noticed that her own voice ceased instantly as if she had been interrupted. I was not expecting this, and could not be certain whether the two voices spoke simultaneously, or whether the illusion was produced by the rapid alteration of the voices coming unexpectedly. This occurred again in the afternoon of this second day.

MR. CLAWSON NOW WALKED OUT UPON THE PORCH WITH PROFESSOR HYSLOP, WHERE HE SHED TEARS. HE REMARKED, "I FEEL JUST AS I DID THE DAY WE BURIED HER; AND I HAVE SURELY TALKED TO MY DEAD DAUGHTER THIS DAY."

I remained inside to try and induce Mrs. Blake to cross the river that afternoon, and visit our friend's office. She seemed well enough; and I told her candidly that I desired to have a photograph taken with her in the group, and that I expected to write an account of my experiments for some publication. This seemed to please her and she readily agreed to go, providing we would send the carriage, and also if we would secure the consent of her husband. This we now did. The latter was away at the beginning of the sitting, but had just returned. He consented, although the ride must be for several miles, as it was necessary to drive down the river to a large ferry.

Mediumship.

Harrison D. Barrett Explains Fully His Position in Regard to the Same.

I have been questioned with regard to my position concerning this important subject by many people during the past year. Those of my friends who have known me from childhood recognize the fact that I hold true mediumship in the highest possible esteem. They also know that I most tenaciously hold to the genuineness of psychic manifestations and to the honesty of many worthy psychics.

If, because I have recognized the fact that our phenomena are shamelessly duplicated and counterfeited, I am considered an enemy to mediumship, I am perfectly willing to be so judged. I know my own state of mind and loyalty of thought to our honest mediums and to genuine phenomena. Those who persist in saying that I do not recognize honesty and genuineness in the two fields named, state that WHICH IS NOT TRUE, KNOWING WHAT THEY SAY TO BE FALSE.

With respect to the question, "Do honest mediums ever give advice in business matters?" I most unhesitatingly say, "YES." When mediums are giving sittings for spiritual manifestations, the excarnates frequently seize upon the opportunity offered them, to counsel their loved ones with regard to business matters pertaining to their immediate and special needs. I do not believe, however, that GENUINE MEDIUMS ever call themselves BUSINESS MEDIUMS. Every person who advertises as a business medium, I consider open to suspicion. He may have a modicum of mediumistic power, but it is overshadowed by the fortune telling and commercial influences which vitiate every particle of genuineness he may possess.

I do not believe that honest mediums ever lend themselves to trickery or to deception with respect to matters of business. The case of Mr. Bennett, in California, who was so completely hoodwinked as to believe that his carriages that he gave to a "business mediums" could be dematerialized, transported to Jupiter and there used by the farmers to help them in their work, is an instance in in point. No intelligent Spiritualist believes for a single moment that such a thing could be done. In fact, every intelligent Spiritualist knows that it could NOT be done, and THAT IT WAS NOT DONE! The medium sold the implements given him by Mr. Bennett and placed the money in his own pocket and that of his confederate. If, to denounce such a practice as this makes me an enemy of mediums and mediumship. I am proud of the appellation. Those mediums who apologize for it and shake their heads over the exposures of such folly are open to suspicion. THEY ARE UNWORTHY OF TRUST.

As for mediums taking fees for their work, permit me to say that I see nothing immoral in their doing so. The laborer is worthy of his hire, and should receive compensation in harmony with the value of that which he gives to those who patronize him. I doubt present day methods being the best methods that could be followed by our mediums. I feel that they should be employed by recognized church bodies as ministers, and receive stated salaries for their work. They should be under contract to give NO sittings outside of those assigned them by the authorities of the church.

I know of one medium who gave fifty-six private readings in one day at three dollars per reading. It was a good day's work! Does anyone who reads these lines believe that all fifty-six readings were absolutely correct, spiritual and helpful in character? If so, then the term "dead easy," that once was applied to me, is altogether too mild for one who asserts his belief in such folly.

Let all of our societies incorporate as religious bodies, filing a statement of the principles upon which said society rests, together with a definition of the terms we use in our special vocabulary, with the civil authorities, then employ settled speakers and mediums and all of the trouble to which we have been subjected in past years will forever vanish away.

The criminal method now in practice in some sections of the country of employing a speaker or medium for a single Sunday and paying him only five dollars for his labor will then be abandoned. Of all people in the world, the Spiritualists should be above such parsimony and cruelty. They well know that no living man can live upon twenty dollars per month and support a wife and family. They are simply getting something for nothing from the one whom they thus abuse, and positively rub their hands in glee at their ability to thus rob him.

A dollar per sitting is none too much compensation for the time the average medium gives his patron. When that patron seeks advice on horse races, location of mines, real estate deals, points on the stock market, tips on the cotton trade, or desires information regarding hidden treasures, pots of gold, lost dogs, stolen horses, sick cats and remedies for flea bites, the medium should be honest enough with himself or herself to turn him away with the admonition that Luke places in the mouth of Jesus of Nazareth, "Seek ye first the kingdom of heaven."

Spiritual mediums should be above worldly material business affairs. There is no objection, so far as I can see, to their referring to special individual needs, but when it comes to make a constant practice of reverting to material affairs in their dealings with spiritual things, they are transcending what is known as spirituality and throwing open wide the door for the entrance of fraud and duplicity. It may be that mediums are justified in giving that which their patrons seek. FOR ONE I DO NOT BELIEVE IT. THEY SHOULD STICK TO THE SPIRITUAL.

A party said to me a few months ago that she had given seventy-six sittings in one week and that seventy-four of them were for advice on business matters. I venture the assertion that the seventy-four were none the wiser for that which they received from her and that seventy-three out of the seventy-four were either misled by what she gave them, or were absolutely defrauded.

Individual needs may bring about a condition in the most highly spiritualized sitting that would lead the medium to speak of home affairs and of the settlement of estates in a way that would be helpful to the one whose heart was broken by reason of its sorrow. To this, I repeat, I do not take any exceptions, nor raise the slightest objection. This kind of work is spiritual because it purifies, soothes and helps those to whom it is given. I refer in my stringencies to those who wish to add to their material wealth regardless of the moral side of their endeavors; to those who wish to take advantage of their fellow men; to those who are devoid of what may be termed spirituality in their lives; to those who believe that athletic sports, fisticuffs, prize fights, pork rooting and eating are the highest attainments to which the souls of mer should aspire.

Genuine mediums have no warmer friend or more earnest defender than I am. I shall speak for them first, last and all of the time, but the moment they resort to practices that are not spiritual as to methods by which they can augment their material fortunes for the mere love of money, that moment I cease to advocate their cause or to stand sponsor for their work. Let them unite with our societies, come under the protection of the banner of organization as spiritual ministers, whose lines of work are clearly outlined, whose principles are determined, whose terms are known to the civil authorities, and then we shall be able to point with pride to our mediums, and not be obliged to blush with shame at the practices in which some of them indulge. All honor to the genuine medium! All hail to him and to all who have faithfully served humanity in this trying field of action. They deserve well at the hands of all Spiritualists and are entitled to their full measure of praise.

Yours for Spiritualism,
HARRISON D. BARRETT.

Mantua Camp, Ohio.

To the Editor: Will you be kind enough to give us space to inform your many readers something in reference to Mapel Dell, its past and future work. For seventeen years these grounds were used by the spiritual and religious people of Northern Ohio, for camp meetings, and many have been converted and made better thereby. But like all other institutions, it takes money to build up and run a camp meeting, and with many years of experience I have learned that they are an expensive thing; but as the conditions required them in order to advance the cause of modern Spiritualism, we fell into line, and have done the best we could under the circumstances, and we are not sorry for it.

In 1890 Mr. W. S. Wandell and myself incorporated the National Spiritual and Religious Association, with headquarters at Mantua, Ohio. We purchased land and built up Maple Dell camp. We also established branch associations, and we prospered until the N. S. A. switched us off the track, but we struggled on until we were exhausted financially, and nearly all our stock members deserted us for fear they would have to help pay the debts, and also the long list of the best speakers who had been at Maple Dell, and had received certificates of ordination which were given full recognition by the courts, also by the railroads, until the managers of the N. S. A. again secured a check on our progress by inducing the Central Traffic Association to not give our speakers clerical permits. This move so affected our speakers that they were compelled to leave us and join the N. S. A. until we did not have a speaker left, and still five of the faithful continued the work until we could not secure excursion rates from Cleveland and other points over the Erie railroad. Then they decided to settle up and close out the camp business.

An auditing committee of five of our best stock members were appointed by the board of trustees to audit all accounts, and after careful investigation they brought in their report, and it was accepted by the board of trustees, and all stock members that could be found were notified of the condition and a response from three hundred and one shares of stock, with no response from twenty shares, advised the board of trustees to turn the property over to the creditors on the following conditions: That the creditors should accept all the property belonging to the Association as a final settlement, and that the stockholders should not be assessed to make a deficiency in case the property was not equal to the debts. So after seventeen years of successful camp work the final settlement was made without difficulty. The creditors, five of them, the faithful ones, now have and hold the property known as Maple Dell Park. If the property had been put up for sale it would not have paid one-half of the debts. The majority of the stock members are well pleased with the settlement, as they are now relieved from any fears of being assessed to help pay the debts. We wish to extend our thanks to all who assisted in the camp work, and were kind and true to the close.

From Dream to Vision of Life

By Lilian Whiting, Author of "The World Beautiful," "The Spiritual Significance," "The Outlook Beautiful," etc.

This book finds its keynote in the question asked by the Archbishop of Canterbury—"The Life Beyond,—what it is? What is its bearing on these present working years?" To the discussion of this vital problem Miss Whiting brings the results of modern scientific research and that peculiar spiritual clairvoyance which has been remarked in "The Life Radiant" and some of her other books. It is written with a certain joyous vitality that communicates itself to the reader in a certain radiance and liberation of new energies. Price $1.00 net.

Turkey Awakening to the Danger.

Turkey wearies of American missionaries, and report says, has determined on their curtailment. The American Board of Missions is informed that the rights granted by the protocol of 1874, allowing foreigners to hold property in their own name, is now practically denied. Hostility to existing treaties is shown, and American missionaries are being denied the right to travel freely in all parts of the empire, save in Hejaz, Arabia: Says Secretary Barton, of the missions:

"There are in Turkey twenty American corporations engaged in religious, educational, and charitable work, with $6,000,000 invested in the country, and this is jeopardized by the growing hostility of the Sultan towards foreigners."

This is as it should be. The Sultan cannot avoid seeing what all know, that the Christian movement in Turkey contemplates the overthrow of the empire. That is the principal object they have in view.

The missions gained privileges by deception, claiming a desire to give her people the advantages of Western education. Colleges were opened ostensibly for that purpose; but so soon as in operation they developed into institutions for Christian propaganda. Then turmoil, strife, riots, the destruction of property, followed by enormous claims for damages, and payments enforced by threats of deluging the country in blood. It has been a wonder how a great government could tolerate such interference with her institutions. She is arousing to action none too soon, if she designs to maintain her institutions unimpaired.

A Grave Offense.

It is always painful to see old age in tears, and still more so when the stricken one occupies an elevated position, and the eyes of all the world are on him. Sympathetic tears must flow, and very justly, as the facts are recited.

Three persons called at the Vatican in Rome, on Easter Monday, to pay respect to his eminence, the Pope. They were Professor Feilbogen, his wife and her sister. His Supreme Highness, deeming the occasion a proper one for a festival, brought forth a piece of the flesh of the blessed Jesus, usually mentioned as "consecrated bread," but prayer had changed it by some mysterious process unknown to scientific thought, into the real flesh of the dead but resurrected Jesus. The recipients removed the sacred morsels from their mouths, and dropped them on the floor. The published account of the sorrowful affair is related in words following:

"The Pope was horrified. The offenders were immediately expelled from the chapel, while his holiness, hiding his deep emotion and amazement, with the view of preventing a scandal, hushed up the incident. From the chapel the trio of offenders were taken to the major-domo's office, where they said they were not Christians, and had received the communion through a mistake and spat out the Host, not believing it to be consecrated. The Pope was so grieved he wept bitterly. He is convinced the sacrilege was premeditated. The Sistine chapel will not need reconsecrating, as was first feared, since sacrilege does not constitute profanation."

To escape punishment the offending family left Rome.

The offenders can rejoice that they escaped cannibalism by declining to eat the flesh of a God.

LOOK FOR THEM!

NEXT WEEK WE WILL SPREAD BEFORE OUR READERS ANOTHER ACCOUNT OF MR. BAILEY'S REMARKABLE SEANCES AT MELBOURNE, AUSTRALIA. HE IS CERTAINLY ATTRACTING ATTENTION THE WORLD OVER. WE SHALL ALSO PUBLISH THE ADDRESS GIVEN IN ALBANY, N. Y., BY A PROMINENT LAWYER, IN DEFENSE OF ELIZABETH HALL, A MEDIUM WHO WAS ARRESTED THERE ON ACCOUNT OF EXERCISING HER MEDIUMISTIC GIFTS. THE ADDRESS IS A SPLENDID PRODUCTION AND SHOULD BE CAREFULLY PRESERVED FOR FUTURE REFERENCE. OUR AIM IS TO KEEP OUR READERS THOROUGHLY POSTED IN EVERYTHING PERTAINING TO OUR CAUSE.

As Seen From the Other Standpoint.

The "Earnest Plea for the Bible," by our Marblehead friend in The Progressive Thinker of two weeks ago is only one side view of a large question. There are but few books in the hands of the intellectual public but have some redeeming features, and there are none embracing more errors than the Bible. Proof of the latter assertion is found in the fact that some one thousand varying sects have sprung into being which have based their creeds and hope on that book. Misstatements and contradictory accounts of events everywhere abound. And this notwithstanding copyists, translators and forgers have been engaged for many centuries trying to bring harmony out of discord.

The clergy, by careful selection, using in some cases only the fragment of a sentence, seem at times to have made good moral points; but they always shun the objectionable features for texts. They seldom attempt to prove that "hate" means love; that exhibition of the war spirit means peace. Such tasks are left to Christian editors and to Bible commentators. They justly repudiate great wrongs and crimes; yet their Holy Bible sustains them. They glorify a murderer, and present him to the world as a model of meekness. They idolize David, while his actions in many respects were infamous. They present us Solomon, with his seven hundred wives, as an example for imitation, and send to the penitentiary those vile men who have married two wives. Not one of the patriarchs is a worthy exemplar, yet all were favorites of the Bible God.

And the women of the Bible! No wonder modern wives and daughters have been held in the back ground, when the Bible record is presented them for consultation.

Read the story of Jael, Judges, chapter 4 and 5, and compare her with Mrs. Gunness, of present-day infamy. Both lured men to destruction. Sisera had been defeated in battle; his warriors had fallen at the edge of the sword, and he alone escaped. He reached the tent of Jael, who saluted him, and called out: "Turn in, my lord, turn in to me. Fear not." And when he had "turned in," she covered him with a mantle, gave him milk to drink, after which he laid down to rest. Then Jael took a hammer, "went softly to him," says the divine record, "drove a nail in his temple when Sisera was asleep." And Deborah, the prophetess, sang, "Blessed above women shall Jael be. He asked water, she gave him milk; she brought forth butter in a lordly dish, with a hammer she smote Sisera, she pierced his temple with a nail, she smote off his head."

No sweet songster will sing peans of gladness to the memory of the La Porte murderess. Only horror and detestation will be heard or mentioned. She was not a special favorite of God, a glorified Bible character. Some goodly priest will come to the defense of Jael; but he has no words of laudation of the heroine who murdered, mutilated and robbed FOURTEEN well-intentioned victims, and buried them, possibly with her own hands, on her farm of slaughter.

But Jael is only one of the many Bible characters of women modern thought condemn. We pass, with merely mention of Tamar and Rahab, the harlot and Lot's daughter, all glorified in Bible story, and pass the escapades of Sarah and Rebekah. But there is one, a gentleman of New England, perhaps a clergyman, we don't know, who, while conceding "the Bible is not infallible, but abounding in contradictions, errors of translation, chronology, and locality," yet inquires: "Why should we seek to destroy the comfort that millions of tired and perplexed souls to-day find in what they understand to be the promises of God?"

Because we would destroy error and falsehood wherever found. We would give the world a better faith, a nobler truth, a more worthy ideal, a loftier conception of God, a reality in place of faith, the certainty of an immortal life where the Bible leaves doubt. We would banish wrong and crime from the earth, exalt the good and the true. Instead of fostering a religion based on faith, we would build hopes on knowledge. Instead of teaching another a Jesus will suffer for our sins, and thus encourage iniquity, we would teach that every wrong will be punished to fullest extent, and that no offender can escape eternal justice. Until this is done violence will abound, and guilt with its thousand stings will go unrebuked.

Instead of teaching hate of father, and mother, brothers and sisters, wife and children, we would inculcate its opposite, and pile all the hate humanity is capable of on that person, God, man or devil, who would teach a damnable religion, administering a share of these curses on priest or prelate who advocates, defends, apologizes for, or tries to explain away such cursed teaching.

"Destroying the comfort of millions!!" Why have Christians for two thousand years waged an incessant war on the religions of the past that carried happiness to countless millions? "They were Pagans," replies the Christian. Are they who teach precisely the same faith as these old-time Pagans entitled to more consideration than they whose religions the moderns have stolen?

And Still the Wave Rolls On.

We learn from the Literary Digest that a monthly periodical, entitled "The New Theory of the World," edited by Dr. W. Breitenbach, has been founded in Berlin, and is being circulated among college students in every university town of Germany. Here is a translation of a brief article by the Digest:

"The flood of light which in the last ten years has been thrown upon the history of the world and its inhabitants, especially man, by geology, paleontology, and the theory of evolution, has made it impossible for older theories founded on religion and mythology to hold their ground any longer. It is time to put a stop to the intolerable and dangerous state of uncertainty in which the public mind is hovering. While the doubt produced by the contradiction between science and faith has altogether unsettled the moral standard which rests on the dictum of antique religious teachers, it has also suggested the formulation of a new and firm basis of morals by means of a theory of the universe which is at once simple and in harmony with our age. Such a basis of morals, if it would obtain universal recognition, must, under present circumstances, obtain its inspiration, not from faith, but from science."

Educated man in all countries is drifting in the same direction. The forces of nature may be held in restraint a little longer by the almost superhuman effort of organized error; but, like the avalanche, once started down the mountain side, it will prostrate everything in its path until it reaches the plain.

A Supposition.

Suppose a power dominating civilization, as did the Roman empire when Catholicism gained control, had, by edicts of emperors, acts of legislation, sustained by powerful armies, Inquisitorial dungeons, torture chambers, stakes and fagots in flame, declared the most insignificant character in all history the promised Messiah; the literary world had exhausted its genius in glorifying his acts, with no regard for truth; and had credited him with performing miracles which contravened natural law; and, finally, the priesthood for two thousand years had proclaimed he was begotten by a God, and called him Emanuel—tell us, good reader, if you do not think he would be worshiped by the populace as a God to-day? But always remember lapse of time, decrees of courts, proclamations of kings, nor the huzzas of the multitude, however loud or prolonged, never changed one error into a right, nor one lie into a truth.

No Reason for Existence.

Arthur B. Moss, in his "Christianity and Evolution," says:

"There is no evidence of the existence of the Jesus of the Gospels, whether considered as a God or a man. It is quite within the bounds of possibility a person may have lived named Jesus or Joshua, or for that matter, a dozen such persons—who proclaimed unpopular doctrines to the Jews, and who, as a consequence, were persecuted and put to death by crucifixion, or, as stated in the Talmud, by stoning."

If there was such a person, Mr. Moss says "Jesus was of the school of Essenes." Then he runs a parallel between the accredited teachings of Jesus and of the Essenes, and shows they were identical in every essential particular.

As for Christianity itself, Mr. Moss says: "Abolish original sin," in which it is claimed man the first day of his being went to the bad by disobeying the command of Deity, "then Christianity has no reason for existence."

Rev. M. A. Matthews,
Seattle, Wash.

My Dear Sir: In one of your recent eloquent sermons, as reported in the Seattle Times, you make the statement that "the theories of soothsayers, witches, mediums, Theosophists and Spiritualists are absolutely repugnant to common sense, decency and every known law of morality and righteousness. Their doctrine concerning the dead are doctrines promulgated for graft, the propagation of fakirs and frauds, and to delude the weak-minded, unsophisticated, the unknown and uncertain quantities in the moral and social world. No human being possesses power to communicate with the dead or to speak to the spirits that have gone on to their future abode, and nobody but an infamous fraud would pretend to possess power to communicate with spirits and transmit their communications to the living."

These are hard words, and unless you have evidence upon which to base your statement, you are not a competent teacher of your fellow men, nor worthy of a place behind the sacred desk. What do you know of Spiritualism? Was the Apostle Paul a fraud when he fell into his trance on his way to Damascus? Were those people frauds who reported that they saw angels at the tomb of the Lord Christ of Nazareth? Were the Apostles frauds when the tongues of flame rested upon their heads on the day of Pentecost and they spake in unknown tongues? Did the Apostle Paul lie when he wrote so eloquently in the first chapter of Corinthians in regard to spiritual gifts?

What is Spiritualism's declaration to the world? Let me quote it in order that you may know a little something of the subject with which you are presuming to deal:

First: We believe in Infinite Intelligence.

Second: We believe that the phenomena of nature, physical and psychical, are the expressions of Infinite Intelligence.

Third: We affirm that a correct understanding of such expressions and living in harmony therewith constitute the true religion.

Fourth: We affirm that the process of life is not interrupted by the change called death, but that man lives beyond the grave, the same conscious being he was on earth.

Fifth: We affirm that communication between the seen and the unseen worlds is a fact, scientifically proven by the phenomena of Spiritualism.

Sixth: We believe that the highest morality is found in the Golden Rule: "Whatsoever ye would that others do unto you, do ye even so unto them."

Is there anything demoralizing in those six principles? Do you repudiate the Golden Rule? In what way are these teachings repugnant to common sense and decency? How have they transcended morality and righteousness? By what authority do you declare that no human being possesses power to speak to the spirits who have taken leave of earth? Have you been endowed with the spirit of omniscience through some special act of the Infinite by means of which you are able to speak the word impossible regarding any question outside of mathematics? Until you bring proof of your omniscience and your wonderful prescience with regard to psychic matters, I shall be under the necessity of considering you a mere mortal, like myself, possessing great ability as a speaker, but prone to err in judgment in common with all your fellow men.

There is not a principle in Spiritualism that is otherwise than wholesome in its application to human life. Spiritualism declares that there is no forgiveness for sin, but that each man must pay the penalty of his wrong doing to the uttermost farthing. Even FALSEHOOD is a sin according to Spiritualism, whether uttered by a CLERGYMAN from the sacred desk or by a man in the ordinary walks of life. Spiritualism teaches that every man must face himself and meet the consequences of his every act in the future world.

Having maligned the Spiritualists of America and falsified with regard to the doctrines they hold, you will have a pleasant time facing yourself and misstatements when you come to enter the real life of the soul. I am going to be charitable, Dr. Matthews. I believe you are ignorant of the subject on which you spoke, and that your judgment was pronounced hastily because of your lack of information regarding a matter so vital. A man is not wholly responsible for his acts when he commits them through ignorance, yet he is responsible for his irresponsibility! If you are willfully ignorant of the subject of which you speak, then your error is that much the greater. There is a difference between honest ignorance and intentional ignorance.

Spiritualism emphasizes right living and right doing here on earth for all of the children of men. It teaches that we are souls to-day as much as we ever shall be and that the kingdom of heaven is to be established through lives that are white and clean, commencing with the present moment. Spiritualism asserts that rewards and punishment are parts of our daily living here on earth and not absolute perquisites of the life within the veil. Spiritualism leads men back to God over the roadway of fact and turns them from the cold and cruel doctrines of materialism and the still more cruel ones of infant damnation and eternal torture. It numbers among its followers the brainiest men and women of all continents and all ages. John of Antioch, known in history as Chrysostom, was a Spiritualist and a trance medium. Polycarp, the gifted saint of the early Christian era, was a self-declared medium. John and Charles Wesley were mediums of a high order of excellence. Emmanuel Swedenborg was one of the greatest seers the world has ever known. Michael Servetus, whom the founder of your church put to death, was a rarely endowed soul, possessing great powers as a medium. In modern times, distinguished scientists, philosophers and churchmen are firm believers in Spiritualism and many of them are mediums. Will you match your intellect against that of Canon Wilberforce, Archdeacon Colley, Rt. Rev. Heber Newton, Prof. Crookes, Rudolph Virchow and Prof William James, of Harvard University? Are they not men of intelligence and moral integrity? I should be proud to associate and to class myself with men of their calibre. Indeed, as a Spiritualist I am in their company, and I must confess that I enjoy their associations in thought and in personal friendship much more than I could possibly enjoy listening to your fulminatalons against God, truth and morality in the indiscriminate, unjust and untruthful statements you make in some of your sermons.

Dr. Matthews, you are an able man and exert a great influence over hundreds of your fellow beings in Seattle. You have no right to mislead them with regard to matters of fact. No man can teach that which he does not know. No man has a moral right to denounce any movement of whose principles he has not thoroughly informed himself. That there is a vast amount of fraud and sordid commercialism connected with Spiritualism, neither I nor any other intelligent Spiritualist will deny. All of our leaders are laboring with might and main to remove fraud and rascality from our midst. Commercialism is not alone confined to Spiritualism. I have known clergymen to accept calls where the salaries were considerably larger than were those previously paid them. It strikes me that there is a little element of commercialism in this respect. There are good and bad in all denominations. Spiritualism has its share of black sheep, just as your church has its full quota. I once sought permission to distribute some Spiritualist papers among the prisoners in the penitentiary in Jackson, Michigan. The managers of the prison declined to permit me to do so on the ground that there was not a Spiritualist among all the criminals incarcerated! I have found, upon examining the statistics of criminology in the United States, that the Spiritualists furnish less than one-tenth of one per cent of the criminals now behind the bars. The Spiritualists number almost as many followers as does your church. Can you say that you will not find a greater per cent of criminals professing your faith in the prisons of the land than one-tenth of one per cent? It seems to me that if religion makes men good or bad, then Spiritualism has certainly been a power for good in its influence upon the lives of its followers, whereas the impress of your religion is open to question upon those who accept your faith.

I am sending a copy of this letter to the Seattle Times, in which your abusive paragraphs appeared. I can hardly hope that that paper will be just enough to publish my words. I therefore take the liberty to address this letter to you personally and assure you that it will appear in full in the columns of some one of the Spiritualist papers in America or Europe.

Trusting that you will be led to see the Light and repent your sins before you take leave of life, I am,

Yours for truth,

HARRISON D. BARRETT.

What Is Death?

A Graphic Description, by Mrs. Mary T. Longley.

He was an OLD man, bent and aged and wan, weary and battle-scarred with the conflicts of more than four-score years. This life had been a rugged one; from early childhood it had been his lot to toil, and that almost without ceasing, for the necessities of life. Left an orphan at an early age, with no one to care for him, the little fellow had shifted about as best he could, picking up a living by running errands, doing odd chores, selling scraps of iron, old bottles and whatever he could find in alley or street that would bring a penny, and often suffering from hunger, cold and loneliness.

It was remarkable that the little fellow remained honest through all this trying ordeal of his early years, but he was a sensitive, and somehow the good angels managed to keep very near him and to guide his young life. The society of rude and profane boys had no attraction for him, and thieving no temptation.

And so his youth passed, and by dint of pushing and striving he managed to get along and to get a great deal of knowledge of human life. He could read and spell, for his mother had taught him this before she passed from earth, and he had spent many an hour reading old papers that he found in ash-heaps and dumps until he got money enough to buy and sell papers for himself; and so on through a score of years, pushing, striving, learning, little by little, working ever and gaining a hard experience as the years went on, for there was no "royal road to knowledge" for him, and no wealthy benefactor to take him and his needs in hand.

In early manhood he continued to learn a trade and to support himself at manual labor, and although held down in the narrow limitations of a factory life, and he was satisfied. In time marriage and humble family life became a part of his experience, but the years brought sorrow and added hardship, for his dear wife and three loving children passed into the great Beyond, and he, crippled in resources, feeble in body, depressed and unhappy, lived the lonely and forlorn life of the forsaken—a simple history, and only one of thousands that could be told in the same breath.

But now he was old, and the end had come, alone and weary, lying in his dingy garret, unthought of by neighbor or friend, it had come to him—The Great Change.

He did not know how long he had been lying there covered by his old and worn-out coat; it had seemed like ages to him. As he was too feeble to rise he had suffered silently through the long day and into the night, but all at once it seemed to him as if he was rising, rising without effort upon a violet, billowy cloud, soft, restful, inviting to repose. A delicate mist-like substance surrounded him, like the hue of a thousand delicate flowers, and perfumed like violets. This vapor he seemed to absorb, and how it rested him, soothing his every nerve, filling him with a delightful sensation of peace, and of languid joy.

Dimly he perceived a change in the old apartment; even the heap of rags that had served as his bed, the bits of old furniture, and the very walls seemed transfigured and to grow in beauty in the beautiful, half-toned violet light that had suffused and glorified the place. He was dimly conscious of this, as he lay in tranquil beatitude, amid the splendor of this spiritual dawn. For a time he lingered—an hour, or was it a year?—he knew not, but happy, happy in the new sensation of absolute rest and peace.

Then the magnetic influence that had enthralled him seemed spent, and he was alert, alive! Every fibre and nerve of his being thrilled as with new and wondrous life! JUST TO BE ALIVE, how the thought thrilled him! No shade of loneliness encompassed him now; no tinge of sorrow; no hint of pain, of age, of weariness; nothing but a sense of joy in life!

As yet he had been aware of no living presence, yet he felt no loneliness. The old room, the familiar and battered possessions, even the thought of material things had faded from sight and mind. He had no view of them, no thought of what he had been. He was simply master of life, and that life was himself!

Then came strains of music—soft, sweet, thrilling—breathing harmonies over his being and within him. He was music itself! Life was music, harmony! All was good.

Then consciousness of standing erect, stately, a being of power, strength and mental energy, clothed in befitting garments; and then a knowledge of companionship, for beside him, smiling upon him, greeting him with outstretched hands and loving arms of welcome were a group of shing ones—happy souls whom he intuitively and at once recognized as his own people. First, his mother, who had left the earth form seventy years before; then the wife of his bosom, and the three radiant ones, whom he felt to be the children they had loved and lost—all there greeting him, lovingly caressing him, and showering welcomes upon him—not a trace of sorrow upon them, and not a shadow of sadness in his own heart.

Then came the recollection—what of himself, his past, his aged, crippled body? He felt a tugging as of some invisible cord, and yield, ing to the pull, he seemed to turn when lo, at his feet lay the old body, wrapped in a white shroud, and men were about to take it away; but this was not self—only the outward form. It held no attraction for him, and he did not even try to follow it to the charnel house of clay. To be freed from that form was a blessed relief, and now, again he turned to follow the blessed company that was guiding him over pleasant pathways of light to higher scenes.

But what a glorious sense of exaltation in this motor power, floating, gliding upward, buoyed by some internal spring of activity, knowing no fear, no hesitancy—simply going and leaving all trace of dust and turmoil behind. At length they paused, not from fatigue, for the spirit had no sense of weariness, but because they had entered what appeared to be a beautiful valley of the greenest verdure, of beautiful trees and smiling streams, flower gardens and restful parks, pretty homes and shining structures, a veritable Arcadia of harmony and peace.

And in this delightful spot the newly arisen spirit found his home—a home, dainty and inviting, comfortable, and full of light—one he had built himself; he was told, with the ethereal substance and power of his own harmonic vibrations and magnetic emanations of a long life of sacrifice and labor which he had patiently endured. This home he had literally brought into shape by the aid of wife and children in some of the hours that he had spent with them in spirit while his poor mortal body slept, for often had he, as countless mortals do, taken nocturnal flights from the earth body during its hours of repose, and mingled with the dear ones of the other shore. Thus had he partially lived with them, partaken of their studies, participated in their interests and occupations, gained spiritual growth with them, and by these experiences, been able to preserve a calm mien and patient endurance—yea, a spirituelle nature—amid the long and harassing vicissitudes of a narrow and painful earth existence.

The Sweet Singer.

Often had he sung for others, for himself he could not sing;
Age his body had enfeebled, but his mind was on the wing;
Like the eagle soaring sunward, tow'rd the source of sacred fire,
Soared his aspirations heav'nward on the wings of strong desire.

He had charmed his raptured hearers with the sweetness of his song,
As they, lost in admiration, thought the hours were never long
While they listened with sweet pleasure as his voice fell on their ears,
And he moved their hearts enchanted unto mirth or sobbing tears.

Now his earthly songs were ended, his sweet voice was hushed and still,
But the music in his nature made his inmost being thrill;
As he sank in peaceful slumber, still his mind was on the wing,
And he smiled in admiration as he heard the angels sing.

So he passed beyond the music of the sweetest songs of earth,
And he gained a voice celestial as he rose in spirit birth;
Now beyond the limits mortal, he has joined the choir above,
And he sings the songs of angels, full of gladness, peace and love.

Turkey Awakening to the Danger.

Turkey wearies of American missionaries, and report says, has determined on their curtailment. The American Board of Missions is informed that the rights granted by the protocol of 1874, allowing foreigners to hold property in their own name, is now practically denied. Hostility to existing treaties is shown, and American missionaries are being denied the right to travel freely in all parts of the empire, save in Hejaz, Arabia: Says Secretary Barton, of the missions:

"There are in Turkey twenty American corporations engaged in religious, educational, and charitable work, with $6,000,000 invested in the country, and this is jeopardized by the growing hostility of the Sultan towards foreigners."

This is as it should be. The Sultan cannot avoid seeing what all know, that the Christian movement in Turkey contemplates the overthrow of the empire. That is the principal object they have in view.

The missions gained privileges by deception, claiming a desire to give her people the advantages of Western education. Colleges were opened ostensibly for that purpose; but so soon as in operation they developed into institutions for Christian propaganda. Then turmoil, strife, riots, the destruction of property, followed by enormous claims for damages, and payments enforced by threats of deluging the country in blood. It has been a wonder how a great government could tolerate such interference with her institutions. She is arousing to action none too soon, if she designs to maintain her institutions unimpaired.

A Grave Offense.

It is always painful to see old age in tears, and still more so when the stricken one occupies an elevated position, and the eyes of all the world are on him. Sympathetic tears must flow, and very justly, as the facts are recited.

Three persons called at the Vatican in Rome, on Easter Monday, to pay respect to his eminence, the Pope. They were Professor Feilbogen, his wife and her sister. His Supreme Highness, deeming the occasion a proper one for a festival, brought forth a piece of the flesh of the blessed Jesus, usually mentioned as "consecrated bread," but prayer had changed it by some mysterious process unknown to scientific thought, into the real flesh of the dead but resurrected Jesus. The recipients removed the sacred morsels from their mouths, and dropped them on the floor. The published account of the sorrowful affair is related in words following:

"The Pope was horrified. The offenders were immediately expelled from the chapel, while his holiness, hiding his deep emotion and amazement, with the view of preventing a scandal, hushed up the incident. From the chapel the trio of offenders were taken to the major-domo's office, where they said they were not Christians, and had received the communion through a mistake and spat out the Host, not believing it to be consecrated. The Pope was so grieved he wept bitterly. He is convinced the sacrilege was premeditated. The Sistine chapel will not need reconsecrating, as was first feared, since sacrilege does not constitute profanation."

To escape punishment the offending family left Rome.

The offenders can rejoice that they escaped cannibalism by declining to eat the flesh of a God.

LOOK FOR THEM!

NEXT WEEK WE WILL SPREAD BEFORE OUR READERS ANOTHER ACCOUNT OF MR. BAILEY'S REMARKABLE SEANCES AT MELBOURNE, AUSTRALIA. HE IS CERTAINLY ATTRACTING ATTENTION THE WORLD OVER. WE SHALL ALSO PUBLISH THE ADDRESS GIVEN IN ALBANY, N. Y., BY A PROMINENT LAWYER, IN DEFENSE OF ELIZABETH HALL, A MEDIUM WHO WAS ARRESTED THERE ON ACCOUNT OF EXERCISING HER MEDIUMISTIC GIFTS. THE ADDRESS IS A SPLENDID PRODUCTION AND SHOULD BE CAREFULLY PRESERVED FOR FUTURE REFERENCE. OUR AIM IS TO KEEP OUR READERS THOROUGHLY POSTED IN EVERYTHING PERTAINING TO OUR CAUSE.

As Seen From the Other Standpoint.

The "Earnest Plea for the Bible," by our Marblehead friend in The Progressive Thinker of two weeks ago is only one side view of a large question. There are but few books in the hands of the intellectual public but have some redeeming features, and there are none embracing more errors than the Bible. Proof of the latter assertion is found in the fact that some one thousand varying sects have sprung into being which have based their creeds and hope on that book. Misstatements and contradictory accounts of events everywhere abound. And this notwithstanding copyists, translators and forgers have been engaged for many centuries trying to bring harmony out of discord.

The clergy, by careful selection, using in some cases only the fragment of a sentence, seem at times to have made good moral points; but they always shun the objectionable features for texts. They seldom attempt to prove that "hate" means love; that exhibition of the war spirit means peace. Such tasks are left to Christian editors and to Bible commentators. They justly repudiate great wrongs and crimes; yet their Holy Bible sustains them. They glorify a murderer, and present him to the world as a model of meekness. They idolize David, while his actions in many respects were infamous. They present us Solomon, with his seven hundred wives, as an example for imitation, and send to the penitentiary those vile men who have married two wives. Not one of the patriarchs is a worthy exemplar, yet all were favorites of the Bible God.

And the women of the Bible! No wonder modern wives and daughters have been held in the back ground, when the Bible record is presented them for consultation.

Read the story of Jael, Judges, chapter 4 and 5, and compare her with Mrs. Gunness, of present-day infamy. Both lured men to destruction. Sisera had been defeated in battle; his warriors had fallen at the edge of the sword, and he alone escaped. He reached the tent of Jael, who saluted him, and called out: "Turn in, my lord, turn in to me. Fear not." And when he had "turned in," she covered him with a mantle, gave him milk to drink, after which he laid down to rest. Then Jael took a hammer, "went softly to him," says the divine record, "drove a nail in his temple when Sisera was asleep." And Deborah, the prophetess, sang, "Blessed above women shall Jael be. He asked water, she gave him milk; she brought forth butter in a lordly dish, with a hammer she smote Sisera, she pierced his temple with a nail, she smote off his head."

No sweet songster will sing peans of gladness to the memory of the La Porte murderess. Only horror and detestation will be heard or mentioned. She was not a special favorite of God, a glorified Bible character. Some goodly priest will come to the defense of Jael; but he has no words of laudation of the heroine who murdered, mutilated and robbed FOURTEEN well-intentioned victims, and buried them, possibly with her own hands, on her farm of slaughter.

But Jael is only one of the many Bible characters of women modern thought condemn. We pass, with merely mention of Tamar and Rahab, the harlot and Lot's daughter, all glorified in Bible story, and pass the escapades of Sarah and Rebekah. But there is one, a gentleman of New England, perhaps a clergyman, we don't know, who, while conceding "the Bible is not infallible, but abounding in contradictions, errors of translation, chronology, and locality," yet inquires: "Why should we seek to destroy the comfort that millions of tired and perplexed souls to-day find in what they understand to be the promises of God?"

Because we would destroy error and falsehood wherever found. We would give the world a better faith, a nobler truth, a more worthy ideal, a loftier conception of God, a reality in place of faith, the certainty of an immortal life where the Bible leaves doubt. We would banish wrong and crime from the earth, exalt the good and the true. Instead of fostering a religion based on faith, we would build hopes on knowledge. Instead of teaching another a Jesus will suffer for our sins, and thus encourage iniquity, we would teach that every wrong will be punished to fullest extent, and that no offender can escape eternal justice. Until this is done violence will abound, and guilt with its thousand stings will go unrebuked.

Instead of teaching hate of father, and mother, brothers and sisters, wife and children, we would inculcate its opposite, and pile all the hate humanity is capable of on that person, God, man or devil, who would teach a damnable religion, administering a share of these curses on priest or prelate who advocates, defends, apologizes for, or tries to explain away such cursed teaching.

"Destroying the comfort of millions!!" Why have Christians for two thousand years waged an incessant war on the religions of the past that carried happiness to countless millions? "They were Pagans," replies the Christian. Are they who teach precisely the same faith as these old-time Pagans entitled to more consideration than they whose religions the moderns have stolen?

And Still the Wave Rolls On.

We learn from the Literary Digest that a monthly periodical, entitled "The New Theory of the World," edited by Dr. W. Breitenbach, has been founded in Berlin, and is being circulated among college students in every university town of Germany. Here is a translation of a brief article by the Digest:

"The flood of light which in the last ten years has been thrown upon the history of the world and its inhabitants, especially man, by geology, paleontology, and the theory of evolution, has made it impossible for older theories founded on religion and mythology to hold their ground any longer. It is time to put a stop to the intolerable and dangerous state of uncertainty in which the public mind is hovering. While the doubt produced by the contradiction between science and faith has altogether unsettled the moral standard which rests on the dictum of antique religious teachers, it has also suggested the formulation of a new and firm basis of morals by means of a theory of the universe which is at once simple and in harmony with our age. Such a basis of morals, if it would obtain universal recognition, must, under present circumstances, obtain its inspiration, not from faith, but from science."

Educated man in all countries is drifting in the same direction. The forces of nature may be held in restraint a little longer by the almost superhuman effort of organized error; but, like the avalanche, once started down the mountain side, it will prostrate everything in its path until it reaches the plain.

A Supposition.

Suppose a power dominating civilization, as did the Roman empire when Catholicism gained control, had, by edicts of emperors, acts of legislation, sustained by powerful armies, Inquisitorial dungeons, torture chambers, stakes and fagots in flame, declared the most insignificant character in all history the promised Messiah; the literary world had exhausted its genius in glorifying his acts, with no regard for truth; and had credited him with performing miracles which contravened natural law; and, finally, the priesthood for two thousand years had proclaimed he was begotten by a God, and called him Emanuel—tell us, good reader, if you do not think he would be worshiped by the populace as a God to-day? But always remember lapse of time, decrees of courts, proclamations of kings, nor the huzzas of the multitude, however loud or prolonged, never changed one error into a right, nor one lie into a truth.

No Reason for Existence.

Arthur B. Moss, in his "Christianity and Evolution," says:

"There is no evidence of the existence of the Jesus of the Gospels, whether considered as a God or a man. It is quite within the bounds of possibility a person may have lived named Jesus or Joshua, or for that matter, a dozen such persons—who proclaimed unpopular doctrines to the Jews, and who, as a consequence, were persecuted and put to death by crucifixion, or, as stated in the Talmud, by stoning."

If there was such a person, Mr. Moss says "Jesus was of the school of Essenes." Then he runs a parallel between the accredited teachings of Jesus and of the Essenes, and shows they were identical in every essential particular.

As for Christianity itself, Mr. Moss says: "Abolish original sin," in which it is claimed man the first day of his being went to the bad by disobeying the command of Deity, "then Christianity has no reason for existence."

An Open Letter to a Clerical Maligner.

He Receives a Modicum of Merited Castigation.

Rev. M. A. Matthews,
Seattle, Wash.

My Dear Sir: In one of your recent eloquent sermons, as reported in the Seattle Times, you make the statement that "the theories of soothsayers, witches, mediums, Theosophists and Spiritualists are absolutely repugnant to common sense, decency and every known law of morality and righteousness. Their doctrine concerning the dead are doctrines promulgated for graft, the propagation of fakirs and frauds, and to delude the weak-minded, unsophisticated, the unknown and uncertain quantities in the moral and social world. No human being possesses power to communicate with the dead or to speak to the spirits that have gone on to their future abode, and nobody but an infamous fraud would pretend to possess power to communicate with spirits and transmit their communications to the living."

These are hard words, and unless you have evidence upon which to base your statement, you are not a competent teacher of your fellow men, nor worthy of a place behind the sacred desk. What do you know of Spiritualism? Was the Apostle Paul a fraud when he fell into his trance on his way to Damascus? Were those people frauds who reported that they saw angels at the tomb of the Lord Christ of Nazareth? Were the Apostles frauds when the tongues of flame rested upon their heads on the day of Pentecost and they spake in unknown tongues? Did the Apostle Paul lie when he wrote so eloquently in the first chapter of Corinthians in regard to spiritual gifts?

What is Spiritualism's declaration to the world? Let me quote it in order that you may know a little something of the subject with which you are presuming to deal:

First: We believe in Infinite Intelligence.

Second: We believe that the phenomena of nature, physical and psychical, are the expressions of Infinite Intelligence.

Third: We affirm that a correct understanding of such expressions and living in harmony therewith constitute the true religion.

Fourth: We affirm that the process of life is not interrupted by the change called death, but that man lives beyond the grave, the same conscious being he was on earth.

Fifth: We affirm that communication between the seen and the unseen worlds is a fact, scientifically proven by the phenomena of Spiritualism.

Sixth: We believe that the highest morality is found in the Golden Rule: "Whatsoever ye would that others do unto you, do ye even so unto them."

Is there anything demoralizing in those six principles? Do you repudiate the Golden Rule? In what way are these teachings repugnant to common sense and decency? How have they transcended morality and righteousness? By what authority do you declare that no human being possesses power to speak to the spirits who have taken leave of earth? Have you been endowed with the spirit of omniscience through some special act of the Infinite by means of which you are able to speak the word impossible regarding any question outside of mathematics? Until you bring proof of your omniscience and your wonderful prescience with regard to psychic matters, I shall be under the necessity of considering you a mere mortal, like myself, possessing great ability as a speaker, but prone to err in judgment in common with all your fellow men.

There is not a principle in Spiritualism that is otherwise than wholesome in its application to human life. Spiritualism declares that there is no forgiveness for sin, but that each man must pay the penalty of his wrong doing to the uttermost farthing. Even FALSEHOOD is a sin according to Spiritualism, whether uttered by a CLERGYMAN from the sacred desk or by a man in the ordinary walks of life. Spiritualism teaches that every man must face himself and meet the consequences of his every act in the future world.

Having maligned the Spiritualists of America and falsified with regard to the doctrines they hold, you will have a pleasant time facing yourself and misstatements when you come to enter the real life of the soul. I am going to be charitable, Dr. Matthews. I believe you are ignorant of the subject on which you spoke, and that your judgment was pronounced hastily because of your lack of information regarding a matter so vital. A man is not wholly responsible for his acts when he commits them through ignorance, yet he is responsible for his irresponsibility! If you are wilfully ignorant of the subject of which you speak, then your error is that much the greater. There is a difference between honest ignorance and intentional ignorance.

Spiritualism emphasizes right living and right doing here on earth for all of the children of men. It teaches that we are souls to-day as much as we ever shall be and that the kingdom of heaven is to be established through lives that are white and clean, commencing with the present moment. Spiritualism asserts that rewards and punishment are parts of our daily living here on earth and not absolute perquisites of the life within the veil. Spiritualism leads men back to God over the roadway of fact and turns them from the cold and cruel doctrines of materialism and the still more cruel ones of infant damnation and eternal torture. It numbers among its followers the brainiest men and women of all continents and all ages. John of Antioch, known in history as Chrysostom, was a Spiritualist and a trance medium. Polycarp, the gifted saint of the early Christian era, was a self-declared medium. John and Charles Wesley were mediums of a high order of excellence. Emmanuel Swedenborg was one of the greatest seers the world has ever known. Michael Servetus, whom the founder of your church put to death, was a rarely endowed soul, possessing great powers as a medium. In modern times, distinguished scientists, philosophers and churchmen are firm believers in Spiritualism and many of them are mediums. Will you match your intellect against that of Canon Wilberforce, Archdeacon Colley, Rt. Rev. Heber Newton, Prof. Crookes, Rudolph Virchow and Prof William James, of Harvard University? Are they not men of intelligence and moral integrity? I should be proud to associate and to class myself with men of their calibre. Indeed, as a Spiritualist I am in their company, and I must confess that I enjoy their associations in thought and in personal friendship much more than I could possibly enjoy listening to your fulminations against God, truth and morality in the indiscriminate, unjust and untruthful statements you make in some of your sermons.

Dr. Matthews, you are an able man and exert a great influence over hundreds of your fellow beings in Seattle. You have no right to mislead them with regard to matters of fact. No man can teach that which he does not know. No man has a moral right to denounce any movement of whose principles he has not thoroughly informed himself. That there is a vast amount of fraud and sordid commercialism connected with Spiritualism, neither I nor any other intelligent Spiritualist will deny. All of our leaders are laboring with might and main to remove fraud and rascality from our midst. Commercialism is not alone confined to Spiritualism. I have known clergymen to accept calls where the salaries were considerably larger than were those previously paid them. It strikes me that there is a little element of commercialism in this respect. There are good and bad in all denominations. Spiritualism has its share of black sheep, just as your church has its full quota. I once sought permission to distribute some Spiritualist papers among the prisoners in the penitentiary in Jackson, Michigan. The managers of the prison declined to permit me to do so on the ground that there was not a Spiritualist among all the criminals incarcerated! I have found, upon examining the statistics of criminology in the United States, that the Spiritualists furnish less than one-tenth of one per cent of the criminals now behind the bars. The Spiritualists number almost as many followers as does your church. Can you say that you will not find a greater per cent of criminals professing your faith in the prisons of the land than one-tenth of one per cent? It seems to me that if religion makes men good or bad, then Spiritualism has certainly been a power for good in its influence upon the lives of its followers, whereas the impress of your religion is open to question upon those who accept your faith.

I am sending a copy of this letter to the Seattle Times, in which your abusive paragraphs appeared. I can hardly hope that that paper will be just enough to publish my words. I therefore take the liberty to address this letter to you personally and assure you that it will appear in full in the columns of some one of the Spiritualist papers in America or Europe.

Trusting that you will be led to see the Light and repent your sins before you take leave of life, I am,

Yours for truth,
HARRISON D. BARRETT.

What Is Death?

A Graphic Description, by Mrs. Mary T. Longley.

He was an OLD man, bent and aged and wan, weary and battle-scarred with the conflicts of more than four-score years. This life had been a rugged one; from early childhood it had been his lot to toil and that almost without ceasing, for the necessities of life. Left an orphan at an early age, with no one to care for him, the little fellow had shifted about as best he could, picking up a living by running errands, doing odd chores, selling scraps of iron, old bottles and whatever he could find in alley or street that would bring a penny, and often suffering from hunger, cold and loneliness.

It was remarkable that the little fellow remained honest through all this trying ordeal of his early years, but he was a sensitive, and somehow the good angels managed to keep very near him and to guide his young life. The society of rude and profane boys had no attraction for him, and thieving no temptation.

And so his youth passed, and by dint of pushing and striving he managed to get along and to get a great deal of knowledge of human life. He could read and spell, for his mother had taught him this before she passed from earth, and he had spent many an hour reading old papers that he found in ash-heaps and dumps until he got money enough to buy and sell papers for himself; and so on through a score of years, pushing, striving, learning, little by little, working ever and gaining a hard experience as the years went on, for there was no "royal road to knowledge" for him, and no wealthy benefactor to take him and his needs in hand.

In early manhood he continued to learn a trade and to support himself at manual labor, and although held down in the narrow limitations of a factory life, and he was satisfied. In time marriage and humble family life became a part of his experience, but the years brought sorrow and added hardship, for his dear wife and three loving children passed into the great Beyond, and he, crippled in resources, feeble in body, depressed and unhappy, lived the lonely and forlorn life of the forsaken—a simple history, and only one of thousands that could be told in the same breath.

But now he was old, and the end had come, alone and weary, lying in his dingy garret, unthought of by neighbor or friend, it had come to him—The Great Change.

He did not know how long he had been lying there covered by his old and worn-out coat; it had seemed like ages to him. As he was too feeble to rise he had suffered silently through the long day and into the night, but all at once it seemed to him as if he was rising, rising without effort upon a violet, billowy cloud, soft, restful, inviting to repose. A delicate mist-like substance surrounded him, like the hue of a thousand delicate flowers, and perfumed like violets. This vapor he seemed to absorb, and how it rested him, soothing his every nerve, filling him with a delightful sensation of peace, and of languid joy.

Dimly he perceived a change in the old apartment; even the heap of rags that had served as his bed, the bits of old furniture, and the very walls seemed transfigured and to grow in beauty in the beautiful, half-toned violet light that had suffused and glorified the place. He was dimly conscious of this, as he lay in tranquil beatitude, amid the splendor of this spiritual dawn. For a time he lingered—an hour, or was it a year?—he knew not, but happy, happy in the new sensation of absolute rest and peace.

Then the magnetic influence that had enthralled him seemed spent, and he was alert, alive! Every fibre and nerve of his being thrilled as with new and wondrous life! JUST TO BE ALIVE, how the thought thrilled him! No shade of loneliness encompassed him now; no tinge of sorrow; no hint of pain, of age, of weariness; nothing but a sense of joy in life!

As yet he had been aware of no living presence, yet he felt no loneliness. The old room, the familiar and battered possessions, even the thought of material things had faded from sight and mind. He had no view of them, no thought of what he had been. He was simply master of life, and that life was himself!

Then came strains of music—soft, sweet, thrilling—breathing harmonies over his being and within him. He was music itself! Life was music, harmony! All was good.

Then consciousness of standing erect, stately, a being of power, strength and mental energy, clothed in befitting garments; and then a knowledge of companionship, for beside him, smiling upon him, greeting him with outstretched hands and loving arms of welcome were a group of shing ones—happy souls whom he intuitively and at once recognized as his own people. First, his mother, who had left the earth form seventy years before; then the wife of his bosom, and the three radiant ones, whom he felt to be the children they had loved and lost—all there greeting him, lovingly caressing him, and showering welcomes upon him—not a trace of sorrow upon them, and not a shadow of sadness in his own heart.

Then came the recollection—what of himself, his past, his aged, crippled body? He felt a tugging as of some invisible cord, and yield, ing to the pull, he seemed to turn when lo, at his feet lay the old body, wrapped in a white shroud, and men were about to take it away; but this was not self—only the outward form. It held no attraction for him, and he did not even try to follow it to the charnel house of clay. To be freed from that form was a blessed relief, and now, again he turned to follow the blessed company that was guiding him over pleasant pathways of light to higher scenes.

But what a glorious sense of exaltation in this motor power, floating, gliding upward, buoyed by some internal spring of activity, knowing no fear, no hesitancy—simply going and leaving all trace of dust and turmoil behind. At length they paused, not from fatigue, for the spirit had no sense of weariness, but because they had entered what appeared to be a beautiful valley of the greenest verdure, of beautiful trees and smiling streams, flower gardens and restful parks, pretty homes and shining structures, a veritable Arcadia of harmony and peace.

And in this delightful spot the newly arisen spirit found his home—a home, dainty and inviting, comfortable, and full of light—one he had built himself; he was told, with the ethereal substance and power of his own harmonic vibrations and magnetic emanations of a long life of sacrifice and labor which he had patiently endured. This home he had literally brought into shape by the aid of wife and children in some of the hours that he had spent with them in spirit while his poor mortal body slept, for often had he, as countless mortals do, taken nocturnal flights from the earth body during its hours of repose, and mingled with the dear ones of the other shore. Thus had he partially lived with them, partaken of their studies, participated in their interests and occupations, gained spiritual growth with them, and by these experiences, been able to preserve a calm mien and patient endurance—yea, a spirituelle nature—amid the long and harassing vicissitudes of a narrow and painful earth existence.

The Sweet Singer.

Often had he sung for others, for himself he could not sing;
Age his body had enfeebled, but his mind was on the wing;
Like the eagle soaring sunward, tow'rd the source of sacred fire,
Soared his aspirations heav'nward on the wings of strong desire.

He had charmed his raptured hearers with the sweetness of his song,
As they, lost in admiration, thought the hours were never long
While they listened with sweet pleasure as his voice fell on their ears,
And he moved their hearts enchanted unto mirth or sobbing tears.

Now his earthly songs were ended, his sweet voice was hushed and still,
But the music in his nature made his inmost being thrill;
As he sank in peaceful slumber, still his mind was on the wing,
And he smiled in admiration as he heard the angels sing.

So he passed beyond the music of the sweetest songs of earth,
And he gained a voice celestial as he rose in spirit birth;
Now beyond the limits mortal, he has joined the choir above,
And he sings the songs of angels, full of gladness, peace and love.

Is Christianity Dying?

A Critical Examination of Its Present Status.—A Glowing Tribute Paid to Spiritualism.

In his book on the Conflict Between Religion and Science, Dr. Draper says: "No spectacle can be presented to the thoughtful mind more solemn, more mournful, than that of the dying of an ancient religion, which in its day has given consolation to many generations of men."

This is the conclusion of one of the ablest and most impartial thinkers of the nineteenth century. Upon the inquiry presented, there is of course, a wide divergence and variety of opinion, both in this country and in Europe.

The conflict is perhaps, sharper and better defined in Germany than elsewhere. In the Literary Digest of May 9, 1908, appears the following article which states the contest with great clearness:

ATHEISM IN GERMANY.

"The more serious, and especially the clerical, section of the German newspaper press is lamenting the lack of Christian feeling, belief, and practise in German homes and German schools. The refined and educated classes, we are told, are fast drifting in the wake of France as represented by Combes and Clemenceau. The anti-Christian movement is desolating the primary schools, robbing homes of discipline and happiness, and driving children to despair and suicide. It has penetrated even to the schools of learning, where the great intellectual leaders of German life sit as professors. The people are tired of the old religions, we are told, science has taught them another way, and a theory of monism is becoming popular which obliterates the idea of a Deity as an independent personality distinct from a created universe. A special propaganda has been undertaken on behalf of Atheism in Germany and is being prosecuted with intense enthusiasm and ability. For instance, a vast body of Atheistic literature is being circulated among college students, says the Germania (Berlin), and a monthly periodical entitled The New Theory of the World, edited by Dr. W. Breitenbach, is being circulated in every university town of the Empire. 'It is an outrage,' declares the Germania, 'to offer to the professors of the colleges, many of whom are Christians, a journal of such thoroughly Atheistic tendencies.' While this journal is being widely taken, its anti-religious tendency is proved by many of its articles, from one of which the writer in the Berlin daily above cited quotes the following:

"'The flood of light which in the last ten years has been thrown upon the history of the world and its inhabitants, especially man, by geology, paleontology, and the theory of evolution, has made it impossible for older theories founded on religion and mythology to hold their ground any longer. It is time to put a stop to the intolerable and dangerous state of uncertainty in which the public mind is hovering. While the doubt produced by the contradiction between science and faith has altogether unsettled the moral standards which rest on the dictum of antique religious teachers, it has also suggested the formulation of a new and firm basis of morals by means of a theory of the universe which is at once simple and in harmony with our age. Such a basis of morals, if it would obtain universal recognition, must, under present circumstances, obtain its inspiration, not from faith, but from science.'

"The writer in the Germania thinks that an intention of taking up arms against Christianity as it at present exists has seldom been announced with more frankness, and it quotes further as follows:

"'We have made it our special study to promote the education of the people in this matter, and to disseminate the teaching of modern natural science which unite in testifying to the unity of universal law, and the certainty of that monism which is the religion of pure reason * * * The ancient religions, as they have been developed in the course of centuries up to the present day, no longer satisfy the cravings of educated people, and the more widely modern scientific knowledge spreads, so much the greater will be the secession from ancient creeds and churches. How are we to find a substitute for a religion which is dead and gone? He who possesses art and science will find in them his religion. The words of our great thinker and poet of Weimar will clearly show us the way in which we must take the old and, for us, obsolete faith into a new path which leads to all the promise of the future.'"

To the student of history no new issue is presented; it is but a continuation of the world old conflict between orthodoxy and heterodoxy; between revelation and reason. Back of it is the thirst for power and prestige. Men are fond of power. Its arbitrary and unquestioned enforcement becomes the strongest passion of the human mind.

Enthroned power, whether civil or ecclesiastical, long established and dominant for ages, never voluntarily surrenders to innovations. Such is the history of all institutions founded on the assumed divine right of kings and priests to rule and govern the masses of mankind.

And be it said to the credit of the kings and priests that as a class they verily believe the assumption to be true; and believe that in so governing men, they are simply exercising the power and authority which the Almighty has graciously condescended to vouchsafe to them. Granting this assumption, the conclusion necessarily follows that there is no room for innovation or reformation; and further that all attempts at reformation are the work of the devil.

Reformation never comes from within, for the simple and all sufficient reason that there can be no contradiction of a divine truth. On the contrary, the existing status is uncompromisingly maintained. It exists and persists until it is uprooted by the grubhoe of revolution, or is ground to dust in the mills of evolution.

He who would discuss this matter with any measure of profit must, as far as possible, divest his mind of bias or prejudice and endeavor to see both sides of this great question. We who believe that reason is the divinest attribute of the human soul, must not forget that conservatism is the balance-wheel of society, and without its controlling influences the whole fabric would break up in confusion and chaos.

We must not forget that the men who sustain orthodoxy are, as a class, earnest, anxious, honest men who believe they are contending for the best interests of society. We must also bear in mind that partisans in the arena of contest always go to extremes; the more earnest they are, the wider the divergence. For example, the clerical press of Germany says: "The anti-Christian movement is desolating the primary schools, robbing homes of their discipline and happiness, and driving children to despair and suicide."

On the other side the inquiry is made: "How are we to find a substitute for a religion which is dead and gone?" These are extreme views, born of a heated discussion. They are not true. The morals of the people are not disintegrating. Christianity is not dead. Its body is not ready for the dissecting table; the surgeons will have to withhold their knives for possibly centuries yet to come. Again, it said: "The ancient religions no longer satisfy the craving of educated people."

In connection with the subject under discussion the inquiry arises what is the craving of educated people? Manifestly it is a desire to know the truth in relation to the immortality of the soul. Some eminent thinkers in their revolt against the absurdities of so-called revealed religion, have taken refuge in the cold, dead, barren, desolate Valley of Materialism; but most of them have found it an undesirable place of abode. It does not satisfy the craving of educated people. Even the soul of a cynic philosopher yearns for something better. But above all things educated people want the truth. Nearly twenty-four centuries ago, Esdras penned these words: "As for Truth it endureth and is always strong; it liveth and conquereth for evermore." Very good. But what is truth? And who shall unfurl its banner?

The belief in the immortality of the human soul is the outgrowth of the CULTURE and EXPANSION of the human intellect. THIS IS A TRUTH. Savage men have no conception of immortality whatever. Sir John Lubbock makes this assertion, and says it is true of all of the savage tribes of Africa to-day.

Lo, the poor Indian whose untutored mind sees God in the clouds and hears him in wind, is simply poetic imagery of a cheap quality. The Algonquin chiefs and their tribesmen, who, in 1620, were the lords of Northern New York and Southern Canada, had no more idea of immortality than had their dogs that hunted and slept and feasted and starved with them. Whoever has any doubt as to this matter let him read Francis Parkman's book, "The Jesuits in North America."

I make these statements to emphasize the fact that belief in immortality is founded not upon IGNORANCE, but upon intellectual CULTURE AND REASON. But belief does not establish a truth. A truth is not established until it is proved and demonstrated with mathematical precision.

We are compelled to the conclusion that the ancient and barbarous theology on which Christianity is founded, has not made this demonstration. Christianity still persists in keeping its face turned backward and is still looking twenty centuries into the dark and gloomy past for its inspiration.

It has failed to satisfy the cravings of the educated mind. The dry and withered husks of this ancient theology no longer satisfy the intellectual appetite; it is starving; it demands a more nourishing diet. From the very nature of its organization, Christianity cannot change its attitude either by reformation or evolution. It is irrevocably wedded to the past.

An inquiry of transcendental importance arises; it is: Can immortality be PROVED—DEMONSTRATED? About sixty years ago a great Spiritualistic manifestation made its advent into the world. It is now known as modern Spiritualism. To-day it exerts a world wide influence not only among scholars and thinkers, but also among the masses of the people. It triumphantly asserts that it has not only proved, but it has demonstrated the truth of immortality. That the living and the so-called dead can and do communicate with the certainty of a Marconigram. Yea more, that they commune face to face.

It has established a code of morals, for the guidance of its adherents in this world, founded on the solid basis of right and justice, condensed and crystallized into two little words: DO RIGHT. It teaches a simple, yet sublime doctrine in relation to the spiritual life, in which righteousness in this life is vitally essential to happiness in the spiritual life; there being no escape from the sins of this life; they must be atoned for to the utmost farthing. In the short space of sixty years, it has produced more books and literature than any ecclesiastical institution in the world except, alone, the Catholic church.

Many of the leading scientists, and especially those of Europe, have recently demanded of the Spiritualists that they submit proofs of immortality to the ordeal of scientific investigation. If the proofs shall satisfactorily sustain the Spiritualists, then indeed will they have unfurled the Banner of Truth, to float triumphantly forevermore; then, indeed, will it live and conquer forever. Then, indeed a new charm will be added to existence, life will be made glorious and well worth living, and death will be greeted as a kind and welcome messenger.

AND IN THE COURSE OF YEARS, SPIRITUALISM WILL ECLIPSE AND OVERSHADOW ALL OTHER FORMS OF RELIGIOUS BELIEF; YEA, MORE, IT WILL ABSORB THEM ALL, AND THE QUESTION PROPOUNDED BY JOB IN THE MORNING OF TIME WILL HAVE BEEN AFFIRMATIVELY ANSWERED.

IMMORTALITY OF ANIMALS.

He Clairvoyantly Sees Spirit Animals, the Same as He Sees People.

To the Editor: I see quite frequently something pertaining to the immortality of animals. I will go so far as to say that if animals have no after life, neither has man.

Being clairvoyant I see those who have departed this earth life, and I have also seen horses, dogs, and cows, and have described them satisfactorily to the parties owning them.

Perhaps Mr. Geo. W. Kates can recall the time he lectured in my hall at Masillon, Ohio; all at once he stopped his lecture and told a story stopped his lecture and told a story about dogs. Just before he started the story I saw clairvoyantly two dogs start across the stage. After the lecture I told him that just before he told the dog story, I saw two dogs cross the stage. He said that their presence was what caused him to relate the story.

I was at a friend's house one evening, and while there I saw a pony and a dog, they apparently came together; after describing them to the family they told me that the description answered to a pony and dog they owned, and that they both died while they owned them. I saw and described a cow to a lady here in this city, and she said the description was correct, that she had owned such a cow. I see them just the same as I see people, so I claim that animals have a spirit and go to their spirit world.

I also claim that we have no right to take the life of any animal—their lives are as sweet to them as ours is to us.

I once told a butcher that I pitied him when he passed out of this life. He asked me my reason, and I told him that all the animals that he slaughtered would be after him.

I personally would not kill a chicken; I do not think I have a right to take a life, for I can not give it; of course we all differ in regard to these things. Some people say that the world would be overrun with these animals if we did not kill them off. That might be so, and again it might not; nature would perhaps remedy that.

About seven years ago, in the state of Ohio there was a law passed forbidding the caging of birds and also the killing of song birds. Are there any more of the birds to-day than at that time? If so, where are they? Every one here thought we would have plenty of song birds in a few years, but I fail to notice any more than before the law went into effect.

Of course by not killing off the birds at all, the ravenous birds hatch their young, and they feed upon the off-spring of other birds, and in that way keep the numbers down.

I have seen the blue-jay fly to the nest of another bird, take the young ones out of the nest, and feed his own young with the little ones of other varieties.

Well, no matter what we eat, we are destroying life by eating the same, as everything we eat has life; one life depends on another life for its maintenance.

One life depends on another all through this life; everything has life until destroyed; the grass has life, and after growing to maturity has still life within itself to start life anew, with the proper handling.

Take potatoes, wheat, corn, fruit—by eating any of these things we are destroying life. Some people claim that our trees and flowers have their counterpart in the spirit world, and that which is in the spirit world is the real, and that it is impossible to destroy that which is the real; the same as the spirit in man, it can not be destroyed.

There is nothing in this world that can be destroyed absolutely.

The real of anything still remains.

People who claim to know, claim in regard to water, there is always the same amount of water on this earth, one time as another, that no matter what you do with it there is never any less and never any more.

I would like to ask what the spirit world would be without our animals and flowers, and such other life as exists here on this earth? Nothing but human beings, and they doing nothing but praising God, and singing Glory, Hallelujah! There certainly would not be much pleasure there for Spiritualists, as they are people who like nature.

A lady told me a few weeks ago that she did not see how I could go to heaven when I died. I told her that if the church people all went to heaven, I did not want to go, for there are a great many that I know who are great church people, that I would not want to associate with. There is one consolation the Spiritualists have, and that is they are privileged characters, and can go where they please in the spirit world, as they are the only people that God can trust out of his sight, the others are all kept by themselves, each denomination after their own kind.

I was just now reading The Progressive Thinker, and noticed the passing out of Carrie E. S. Twing's husband. I feel so sorry for Mrs. Twing, as she is a dear, good soul, one whom I always liked to hear, as she gives such good, motherly advice. Now is the time when she will appreciate the knowledge of spirit return, perhaps more than any other time in her life, for she will know that he who was so dear to her, who to the world is dead, is not dead, but that he will ever be near her to guide and strengthen her.

She knows these truths, for she has been teaching them for years. She has been on the best rostrums in the country, and never fails to draw a crowd.

I will relate a little story that I know to be true, and took place here in Massillon. There was a young man here by the name of Jacob Barrick. One day he and a friend were out in the woods, and Jacob fell into an abandoned coal shaft and was killed. He was taken out and buried. The next morning after the burial, his brother came to see the sexton of the cemetery and told him that his brother Jake had been dug up by the doctors. The sexton's name was Perry Merrell. Perry tried to talk him out of that, as he said there had never been a grave disturbed since he was sexton; he said that he had a private mark that he put on all graves, and would always look at the graves the next day, and he knew he just imagined that his brother was taken. But he insisted that he was gone, so the sexton went with him to the grave and sure enough he was gone. Now who or what told this man this brother was taken? Perhaps it was the spirit of Jacob Barrick that told it himself. If any one cares to investigate this, they can do so, as the names are not fictitious, but the real names, and there are plenty of people here who can recall this. S. BURD.

LIFE IS FLEETING.

Life is fleeting, short our stay,
March of hardship marks our way;
But, if in ourselves we trust,
Live our life, humane and just,
Pleasantness marks fleeting day,
Hardship bears a cheering ray.

Ever onward must we strive,
Will we at the height arrive;
Ever must we busy learn
Life's own lesson to discern.
For, if we not stake our chance
Will the wind it carry hence.

Life is short, but if we try,
Plant good deeds, then by and by,
Will the days gain much in length,
And each hour build up new strength.
Patience mated with good will Overrides the steepest hill.

A Lost Spirit.

Introductory. The accompanying contribution has been furnished us by Mr. E. Pleasance, the leader of the Friday evening circle (for members only) held by the Manchester Central Spiritualist Association, at their rooms in Britten Hall, Bridge street. It was automatically written through Mrs. Hope, a member of the circle, and is well worthy of attentive and careful perusal.—Ed. T. W.

When I say a lost spirit, I do not mean one who is lost eternally, as such cannot be, but one who has left the material world and entered into the world of spirit and is lost in wonderment. Such an one I know. He was during his earth-life a man who lived an indifferent life, not bad, but easily influenced. He had many friends, not all of the best. He was often led away from the paths of purity and truth, but his remorse consequent on these outbreaks was great. He would then try to be better. He was, until he would be again found by his friends, who worked upon his weak points, leading him astray again.

This man was cut off in the prime of life, much to the sorrow of those who had tried to lead him to better ways. He had no chance of undoing the many careless actions he had committed. His entrance into the spirit world was sudden. He was at a loss to locate himself, wondering where he could be. His eyes were still open to material things, and he could still see his sorrowing relatives around the bed on which his body lay surrounded by loving ones. He was quite unable to let his friends know of his presence. He was troubled to see their sorrow and he unable to comfort them.

Wonderingly he looked around and saw a bright angel form, who took him by the hand, saying in a sweet voice: "Brother, come with me." He felt to disobey was impossible. He followed the radiant form with feet which seemed to glide through space. All seemed an endless mass of blue ether. His passage occupied but a short time. His angel friend led him onward to an infinitely beautiful sea of silver, on the shores of which were many others waiting, some looking around in wonder, and others seemed to understand their position, whilst some passively accepted their surroundings. Oh, the wonder of that glistening sea, the calmness of which made it as glass, and its radiance of unspeakable beauty. Guides in angel form were moving to and fro helping those who had still their earthly conditions clinging to them, others leading those wilfully blind to the water's edge. Wonderment was depicted on many faces; they had yet to know they had left their earthly home for a better. On this lovely shore they waited till the angel led them quite to the brink. Our friend among them, they were gently told to enter into the many boats awaiting them and be taken across the silver main.

Eye cannot picture a fairer scene than that spread out before them. All were helped by angel friends, not left behind; onward they went; who could tire of such a journey? They reached the opposite shore, on the banks of which crowds were waiting to greet them—fathers, mothers, children, and companions who had gone before, all waiting to clasp the hands of the bewildered ones. Many the heartfelt thanks from those hosts of friends that their loved ones had, after weary waiting and longing, come to join them, and so re-unite the bonds of love, and make up the missing links of the chain woven between heaven and earth. No mourning now; no longing for the earth life again; all sure of a haven of rest. They are led by the bright messengers to their loved ones, easily recognized, and many the hands clasped in loving grip. Their entrance to the spirit world was the end of their earthly pilgrimage.

Our friend was not left alone, he had his dear ones who met him with outstretched hands, no questions asked, no doubts expressed as to his fitness for those scenes of beauty, and peace. Remember, he was not all bad; no one of God's creatures ever is. His many sins had been followed by sorrow and hearty repentance, but he had still to learn the lesson that his misdeeds had borne their own fruit in the world he had left, but his sorrow for them had helped him to his birthright. So, let us leave him. His work is only just begun in the heaven he had entered, and with the help of those willing ministering angels, his life in those happy regions is set apart to help those who require aid and guard others on the earth plane from falling into the sins he had himself been so prone to commit. This help has been given to many who have entered this state in wonder and ignorance. Help can be given after leaving your world, but it is better to do your good work before leaving it, then you can more fully enter into the joys prepared for you and yours. Sin must be accounted for here or there; better for you if your accounts are straight before entering here. May God's angels guide you into the path which leads to the heavenly shores, there to meet your loved ones without fear, having lived your life in honor and truth, with love towards all. Friends, you may be thinking of those dear ones who sometimes come back to you in trouble and tears. It makes you wonder how it is they do not appear to be happy and at rest. It is so, in some cases, but you must remember that it is mostly so with those newly passed over. They do appear miserable sometimes, but such is not always the case; they have, for one thing, not got used to the change of life, and all is strange to them. Sometimes they are troubled by the sorrow of those they leave behind, and to some it is the easiest way of coming back again; they see their friends and fear they will not be able to be recognized, so they show by their tears that they have not long left them. Do not trouble or think that they are not happy; do not keep them earth-bound by your sorrow and repining, it greatly retards their progress and has the effect of keeping them bound to their earthly conditions. Spirits are as human in their feeling as you are, and are greatly influenced by the conditions given them by you. They have passed into spirit life, but they are still keeping in touch with those they have left, so, friends, help them all you can. Cease sorrowing, and give them the benefit of happy thoughts. The early life in the spirit world is but the stepping-stone to future unalloyed happiness and well-being.

Now as to the spirit-life of which I have spoken, I have a little more to say with regard to that spirit-life. All who enter that happy home of the "just made perfect" have a work to perform. Theirs is not the idle life some suppose; their faculties would become rusted if they were unused, and what better way than using them for the good of their fellow-creatures? They may not have been over zealous in good works before they came to us, but they must take up their work here and make up for time lost. Their work makes them happy, knowing that it leads to progress, and there are so many who even there do not care to work, living as they did on the earth—a band of unemployed, because they will not see the work there is to do. They were idle in their earth life, and cannot see that work means progression. It will not always be thus with them. Sometimes the spark of ambition for betterment will be lightened by just a little wish for improvement, then it is that the spirit help, which has never been far away, steps in and fans the spark to a flame, which is not allowed to die out for want of fuel. So they go onward, ever reaching a step higher, till their progress is assured and their happiest heights attained, never again looking back, but ever forward, until at length they reach the spheres of unmeasurable bliss for ever and ever.—Two Worlds, Manchester, England.

LIFE.

Oh, Life! we are learning thy lessons,
And, who are our teachers? you ask;
All nature conspires to this learning,
'Tis her object, her aim and her task.

Life, nature through all of her working,
Her innumerable phases at play,
All teach us the lessons of being,
And will teach all who listen and pray.

Then consider the world that we live in,
The beauty, the grandeur, the plan,
To evolve in its glorious perfection
The glorified soul of a man!

We all are thus dowered—and gifted
With souls that must ever thus live;
The universe made for this purpose,
Her wealth and her riches must give.

Who shall tell of the value of spirit?
Who measure the worth of a soul?
When a universe grand in its mission
Was given—its worth to unfold.

Who can tell of the joy of our spirits
When farther the journey we've trod?
When nearer the crown of our being,
And nearer the presence of God.

I know that our lives must know sorrow;
I know that the journey is long,
And oft times we faint by the wayside—
And oft times we suffer from wrong.

These lessons are all in our life path,
These lessons we must not forget,
They teach us that we are but human,
And our brothers are suffering there yet.

So sweet in the sympathy springing
To aid in their joy if we can,
And thus are our natures unfolding,
And thus is the progress of man.

So welcome, my sisters and brothers,
Life's lessons that come every day,
And look for the lesson they bring us,
That will help us so much on the way.

So unfoldment, progression and growing,
Are all in our everyday life;
Are all aids to life's grander unfoldment,
But they come through life's turmoil and strife.

So we welcome our life's sterner duties,
Whatever the lesson may be,
For we know, yes, we know they are blessings
All that come to our life—you and me.

The beautiful flowers in our pathway,
That thrill us with worshipful praise,
And the lovelight from eyes of our darlings,
Our souls by their blessings shall raise.

For love is our life's highest mission,
For this was the universe made,
For this came the beautiful sunshine,
Though ofttimes were blessed in the shade.

Then cherish your life's highest treasure,
This spirit, the life of the soul,
No word and no thought can express it
For it is—and expresses the whole.

Eye Glasses Not Necessary

Eyesight Can Be Strengthened, and Most Forms of Diseased Eyes Successfully Treated Without Cutting or Drugging.

That the eyes can be strengthened so that eye glasses can be dispensed with in many cases has been proven beyond a doubt by the testimony of hundreds of people who publicly claim that their eyesight has been restored by that wonderful little instrument called "Actina." "Actina" also relieves sore and granulated lids, iritis, etc., and removes cataracts without cutting or drugging. Over 75,000 "Actinas" have been sold, therefore the "Actina" treatment is not an experiment, but is reliable.

The following letters are but samples of hundreds we receive:

J. J. Pope, P. O. Box, No. 43, Mineral Wells, Texas, writes—"I have spent thousands of dollars on my eyes, consulted the best doctors in the United States, dropped medicine in my eyes for years and "Actina" is the only thing that has ever done me any good. Before using "Actina" I gave up all hope of ever being able to read again. Had not read a newspaper for seven years. Now I can read all day with little or no inconvenience."

Rev. Charles Carter, East Springfield, N. Y., writes:—I have made a severe test of "Actina" by casting aside my glasses and have not had them on since except to see what change had been wrought since the treatment began. My eyes gradually gained strength and power, and now my glasses are no longer necessary, for I see as well, if not better, without them. I recommend "Actina" to all my friends.

E. R. Holbrook, Deputy County Clerk, Fairfax, Va., writes:—"Actina has cured my eyes so that I can do without glasses. I very seldom have headache now, and can study up to eleven o'clock after a hard day's work at the office."

"Actina" can be used by old and young with perfect safety. Every member of the family can use the one "Actina" for any form of disease of the Eye, Ear, Throat or Head. One will last for years, and is always ready for use. "Actina" will be sent on trial, postpaid.

If you will send your name and address to the Actina Appliance Co., Dept. 342N, 811 Walnut street, Kansas City, Mo., you will receive, absolutely FREE, a valuable book—Professor Wilson's Treatise on Disease.

General Survey.

The Spiritualistic Field—Its Workers, Its Work, and General Progress, the World Over.

THIS GENERAL SURVEY DEPARTMENT IS ONLY INTENDED TO CHRONICLE THE ENGAGEMENTS AND WORK OF SPEAKERS AND MEDIUMS. A REPORT OF WHAT THE VARIOUS SPEAKERS SAY WILL NOT BE PUBLISHED, AS WE HAVE NOT SPACE SUFFICIENT FOR THAT PURPOSE.

KEEP COPIES OF YOUR POEMS sent to this office, for they will not be returned if we have not space to use them.

DR. BURGESS, PRESIDENT OF THE CHICAGO SPIRITUALIST LEAGUE, HAS BEEN ENGAGED AS TEST MEDIUM AT LILY DALE. THE DOCTOR IS WELL AND FAVORABLY KNOWN IN CHICAGO, AND WE ARE GLAD TO HAVE HIM INFUSE HIS MAGNETIC PERSONALITY INTO THE ATMOSPHERE OF THE EAST.

Rev. Sophia B. Seip, president O. S. S. Association, lecturer and platform test medium, desires a change. She will answer calls in any state, or at camps for a short or long period. Address her at No. 302 Alisky building, Portland, Ore.

Rolla Stubbs writes from Long Lake, Minn.: "We had with us on May 17 Mr. and Mrs. Henry Hegdahl, of Minneapolis, who gave us a course of lectures and test circles. They are splendid workers. Mr. Hegdahl is now working for the State Association as missionary, and would like dates throughout the state of Minnesota and South Dakota. If there are any Spiritualists in the state wishing a good lecturer, please correspond at once with Mr. Hegdahl at 2229 Sixth street, north, Minneapolis, Minn., thus enabling him to make out his route throughout the state. Please help him by making arrangements for halls, and post bills for his dates of meetings. Our Lyceum work is growing here in numbers. Our attendance is good and the children manifest much interest in the work."

Dr. F. C. Goodale writes from Oddfellow hall, Tacoma, Wash.: Society of Spiritualists, Brother H. E. Howes is still with us doing good work. His lectures are instructive and are followed by tests that are in nearly every case recognized. On Sunday afternoon, April 26, he held a flower seance, which was a great success. He gave over twenty tests from flowers brought by the audience. Every test was recognized. Sunday last, May 12, he dealt with written questions from the audience in a very able manner, giving great satisfaction."

Dr. T. Wilkins writes of the mass-meeting at Rockford Sunday, Maay 17: "The morning services consisted of a conference, in which the writer hereof led off with a short address, followed by Dr. C. A. Burgess, Mrs. Nora E. Hill and Mrs. Mary Weaver on the needs of the Cause. Mr. Beoth also made remarks on the organization of Spiritualism in Rockford. The afternoon exercises were largely attended, the speakers being Mrs. Hill, an invocation, poem by Dr. Wilkins, addresses by Dr. Burgess, Rev. J. H. Demby, Miss Roubie; messages by Mrs. Hilbert, Mrs. Weaver, Mrs. Hill and Dr. Burgess. Everything went off like clockwork, and was satisfactory to the audience. The evening session was before a full house and consisted of an address of thirty minutes by the writer on the subject, "Individuality, Duality and Unity," and ended when the storm caused a commotion behind the rostrum, but was listened to with deep interest. Messages were given by Mrs. Weaver,, Mrs. Hill, Dr. Burgess and Mrs. Hilbert. Miss Everett, daughter of Secretary Everett, presided in an accomplished and inspirational manner at the piano. The mass-meeting was a grand success all the way through—educationally, socially, and financially, and must have done good missionary work. The Progressive Thinker was very much in evidence and thoroughly commended by Dr. Burgess and your correspondent. This meeting is to be repeated in a grove at Elgin on Sunday, June 21, by way of a picnic, to which the Spiritualists' children of Chicago are to be escorted and entertained."

Last Saturday and Sunday Dr. J. M. Peebles lectured at Genoa, Ill. His subjects were: "India as I Saw It Last Year; the Magic—Black and White; Her Adepts; Burning of Her Dead; Child Marriage;" The Pyramids of Egypt, and Travels in Palestine;" "Immortaalit; Its Proofs; Condition of the Dead."

W. Brockway writes: "The Occult Scientists will close its meetings Sunday, May 31, until September, having met with great success the past season, the Vincennes hall being crowded many times to its utmost capacity. On Sunday, May 31, will be given a varied program, opening with illustrated lecture on Therapeutic Sarcognomy by Dr. Tisdale. Several solos, etc., will be rendered, closing with messages by the pastor, Mrs. Brockway. In June Mr. and Mrs. Brockway will take a trip to the Pacific slope, making a short stay at Denver, Col.; thence to Portland, Oregon, and possibly may meet some of their old friends at intermediate points. Thanking The Progressive Thinker and the many friends for their courtesy, we hope the angel friends may bless them, and our efforts when we return in September."

The marriage of Miss Anna E. McIntosh and Mr. Albert W. Harris, of Detroit, Mich., was quietly solemnized Wednesday evening, May 20, at the home of the officiating minister, Laura L. Crawford, pastor First Church of the Soul, in the presence of a few friends. Mr. and Mrs. Harris will leave the city for a short time and then return and make their home in Detroit.

Mr. Henry Hegdahl would like to have Spiritualists throughout Minnesota write to him at once for dates to lecture. He is employed by Mr. J. S. Maxwell, State President, to do missionary work. Address him at 2229 Sixth street, north, Minneapolis, Minn.

The Band of Harmony, auxiliary of tf the Church of the Soul, has adjourned its regular meetings until fall. The "summer socials" will be held in the homes of the members during the season. See notice of socials in column of General Survey.

Mrs. Maggie Henry writes: "A large crowd assembled in the Universal Occult Society hall at 77 East 21st street, May 17, to listen to the lecture by the guides of Mr. Bloom, and we feel sure that all were amply rewarded, not alone by the beautiful words of truth and wisdom that came from the speaker's lips, and spirited messages from Mrs. Bloom, Mrs. Moore, Madame De Loux and Mrs. Vaughn. Mr. Stein also gave some good messages. Our music was fine fine. Master Walter Abbeles was present with his violin and delighted all. Meetings every Sunday at 8 p. m., conducted by Mrs. Maggie Henry, 3103 Prairie avenue."

Mrs. Mabel Harris writes from Akron, Ohio: "The Progressive Sunshine circle meets every Thursday at 7:30 p. m. May 14 I held a Box May Social. Much interest is shown and many converted to the Spiritualist church. Meetings will close May 28; open Sept. 3. The average attendance from September to present time, 35; converted, 17, showing a decided success. Those wishing to engage my services for June, July and August as a test and trance medium may address me at my permanent home, 61 Bartges street, Akron, Ohio."

Geo. A. Letford, the well-known Drummer Medium, has the following engagements this summer at the camps: Winfield, Kansas, July 18, 19, 20 and 21; Lily Dale, N. Y., July 24 to 30; Grand Ledge, Mich., Aug. 2 to 7; Chesterfield, Ind., Aug. 8 to 14. He is nearly through with his trip in the South, and expects to be in Chicago about June 10 or 12.

Mrs. Maggie Waite wishes to inform her friends and patrons that she has moved to 4111 Indiana avenue, where she can be consulted daily. She will not leave the city this summer, and will reopen her meetings in the fall.

Mrs. E. E. Wilkinson writes from Hutchinson, Kansas: "The Spiritual meetings have closed until Sept. 1. For five months Mrs. Josephine Bruer, of Sterling, Kan., secretary of Kansas State Spiritualist Association, has been lecturing for us, with excellent satisfaction. She is sincere, earnest and energetic. We had hoped to continue our meetings through May, but owing to Brother Bruer's health, she asked to be released to go to Nebraska and other points on a trip for his health. We close our meetings with regret, because we have had a spiritual feast. Our good thoughts go out to our sister. We know she will do good wherever she goes, and will continue to grow, for she is deep in sympathy with all the struggling children of earth."

G. H. Sidwell writes: "The Second Spiritualists' Church, formerly The Church of the Psychic Forces, held its regular Sunday services at Wilcox hall, 361 East 43rd street, May 17. These meetings are such that it is a pleasure to attend. We had the opportunity of having with us Mr. C. F. Leon who gave several interesting readings from Articles, which were all recognized. Our pastor, Mrs. Isa Cleveland, gave her usual ballot reading, which is always lisened to with much interest. The people who attend these meetings always tell their friends of the good they receive, and thus the attendance is always on the increase. This society gave the first of a series of socials Wednesday, May 20 (which will be held every two weeks), at Brother H. F. Arnold's residence, 427 East 47th street. The ladies of the society prepared the refreshments, and a most enjoyable time was had by all. We were highly entertained by a story by Brother Arnold, a song or two by Brother A. Hooper, article reading by Sister Cleveland, and music by Mrs. H. F. Arnold, and then refreshments and coffee were served by Brothers Coomley, Hooper and Andrews, who were gotten up in such a style that it was with difficulty that we ate the good things set before us, on account of not being gifted with the power to eat and laugh at the same time. The next social of this society will be held Wednesday, June 3, at Brother C. S. McLane's, 4600 Prairie avenue. Everybody invited to attend these socials."

Secretary writes from Providence, R. I.: "The First Spiritualist Church reports progress during last month. Mrs. Annie Chapman, of Brighton, Mass., made her first appearance on our platform May 3, and the audience was pleased with her lectures and messages. Mrs. Carrie Thomas, of Brooklyn, N. Y., and Mrs. Belcher, Marlboro, were the speakers, for last two Sundays. Our Auxiliary is in good working order and will meet with the president, Mrs. Louise D. Francis, for the rest of the season. Friends and members of the Auxiliary met at her home May 14 and presented her with an immense May Basket filled with gifts, and also delicacies of the season. It was a surprise and was enjoyed by all. Refreshments were served and the social time ended with a circle, when Mrs. Francis gave spirit messages to all present. All had an enjoyable time, and the midnight hour found the friends starting home. The season will practically close June 7. All told, it has been a profitable season. We send greetings to all the workers in our cause."

Mr. C. A. Thompson, 615 Monroe street, holds a circle every Thursday evening at 8 o'clock. Admission, 25 cents.

Mrs. Bergere writes: "The Fraternal Daughters' meeting of Wednesday afternoon and evening, May 20, was a success both in profit and sociability, as these meetings always are. We were especially honored and entertained by a distinguished visitor and prominent medium, Robert Mansell, of Boston. We hope to have him with us again at aur next and last social of the season, Wednesday, May 27; also at our grand patriotic concert jubilee on June 1. Don't miss coming to the social, as besides the amusement, cool and tempting refreshments are on the program."

Mrs. Harper writes. "I was very much surprised to receive from Mrs. Howes, on my return from the hospital, the sum of $13.30, the amount collected by her during my illness, and I take this opportunity to thank her from my heart for this token of her love and sympathy for a sister medium."

W. F. Schumacher writes: "The Church of the Spiritualistic Society Students of Nature at Van Buren Opera House, closes its season Sunday evening, May 24, with flower reading by the pastor. We thank all the noble workers and mediums who have assisted this society in its success. It has a good fund in its treasury for the month of September opening, hoping to see all the true seekers for knowledge with us at that time."

The well-known medium, Mrs. Isa Wilson Kayner, is now located at 1954 Tenth street, San Diego, Cal.

Mrs. Dr. Caird writes: "The May party given by the Illinois Sunflower Club last Saturday evening at the residence of Mrs. J. R. Francis was a most enjoyable affair. Guests were present from the South and North Sides. Many of the boxes were beautifully decorated. The ladies receiving prizes were Mrs. Moore, first; Mrs. Mary Weaver, second. The spelling class conducted by Mrs. Chandler and Mrs. Lichtig, Mrs. Lawrence captured the prize, the only one in the class who spelled all the words correctly. At 9:30 coffee and lunch was served, after which the time was given up to social enjoyments until a late hour, when all reluctantly betook themselves to their various homes. We feel that more of these meetings should be held, thus bringing the members nearer together. Next Tuesday, May 26, the club will hold its Tea Party at Lincoln hall, 70 E. Adams street. Good mediums in attendance."

Ferd. C. Suhrer writes: "The services of the Fraternal Order of Spiritualists are still well attended, despite the attractions offered by the different summer attractions in and around Chicago. On Sunday, May 17, seven of our mediums held as many circles, voicing messages of tenderness to some and giving much needed advice to others—all doing a noble work of love and charity, which is appreciated. Many of our members and friends wanted us to continue through the summer, but owing to the extreme warm weather and the camping season, where many of our workers have engagements, it was decided best to close the season with the last Sunday in May, the 31st. Let all attend this day and show our appreciation. It will be a real love feast. The following Monday, June 1, will occur our Patriotic concert, and many pleasant and novel features presented, after which the young folks will dance National airs of the different countries which will take us back "home." Don't miss this. Twenty-five cents pays for the whole thing. Hygeia hall, 406 Ogden avenue, Robey street, top floor."

Carrie L. Hatch writes from 9 Appleton street, Boston, Mass.: "The First Spiritualist Ladies' Aid Society met as usual at the above place. A very interesting meeting was held. The following talent taking part: Mrs. Alice Waterhouse, Mrs. Graves, Mrs. S. C. Cunningham, Mrs. Lizzie Shackley, and Mrs. Mary F. Lovering, pianist. Next Friday, memorial services will be held and the best talent will be present. The sessions are free and all are invited. Flowers and plants are solicited, and will be gratefully received. This will be the closing day of the Ladies' Aid. Remember, two sessions next Friday, 2:30 and 7:45."

Mrs. Belle L. Curtis writes: "The Illinois Sunflower Club will hold a rummage sale in the near future. All donations from friends of the cause will be gladly received by the committee. Due notice will be given of time and place of the sale, and if donations can not be sent direct to the sale, a postal directed to the chairman, Mrs. Belle L. Curtis, 615 Otto street, will bring some one to look after the same. This is a good chance to get rid of your old clothes and help the cause at the same time."

Mrs. R. S. Lillie, the well-known lecturer, is now located at 358 West Roble street, St. Paul, where she can be addressed for engagements, or to attend funerals. A letter from her will appear in our next issue."

Correspondent writes: Geo. H. Brooks delivered a masterly lecture for Unity Society, Milwaukee, Wis., Sunday evening, May 24, to an appreciative audience. He was assisted by Dr. T. Wilkins with an opening and closing poem. Mr. Brooks also gave three good messages, after which a business meeting of Unity Society and the W. S. S. A. was held and a dance social set for Saturday evening, June 20. It is expected and desired that a large attendance will be had. The State Association has arranged to make this a union meeting. A mass-meeting will be held in Milwaukee Friday, June 5. See announcements next week."

Mrs. H. F. R. Peet, corresponding secretary, writes: "The first of the Summer Socials given under the auspices of the Band of Harmony, was held on Thursday afternoon, May 21, at the home of Mrs. Ellis. It proved to be a very happy occasion, with the lunch and a euchre party. The next Social will be held at the home of Mrs. Dexter, 1000 North Halsted street, Thursday, June 4, afternoon and evening. Ladies, bring lunch; coffee served at 6 p. m. All cordially invited."

Correspondent writes: "The Morris Pratt Institute Association held its sixth annual meeting Wednesday, May 20, and in the evening was held the graduation exercises, six students graduating with great credit to the faculty and themselves. A goodly number of people were present to show their appreciation of the work done at this young institution. Upon this point space forbids more than a brief mention at this time. Doubtless the secretary's report will be ready for the next issue of The Progressive Thinker. But when the Spiritualists awaken to the real value of this institution to the Cause, there will no longer be a stint in the funds for its operations. But more can be said of this later."

H. Hegdahl, State Missionary for Minnesota, writes that he found good work being done at Long Lake. A Lyceum has been started in which old and young participate. He desires Spiritualism to be made a religion and wishes all to assist the State Association. May 26 and 27 he will hold meetings in Princeton. At Milaca he found a few who had a knowledge of spirit return.

DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES.

Of the Philosophical Society of Spiritualists, Clinton, Iowa, Over Which Mrs. Alice C. Barry Presides.

Believing, 1st. That a Beneficent Power and Wise Intelligence Pervades and controls the universe.

2nd. That the human race is one family of brotherhood, whose interests are forever inseparable.

3rd. That all action, according to its quality, results in suffering or in joy by the operation of inherent laws physical and spiritual.

4th. That all human beings are destined to a continued individual existence in a future state for which the experiences and attainments of the present life are preparatory.

5th. That realized communion with those who have gone before us to the spirit world is practicable under suitable conditions, and is a privilege of high value to those who use it wisely.

6th. Believing also that the achievement of true lives and a nobler civilization can better be attained by associative and co-operative action, we therefore agree to unite our efforts for the practical application of these convictions.

The Shuttle of Time.

'Tis a beautiful thought, through the age outwrought,
And I think it must be true,
That the deeds we do in our earthly life
Come back to me and to you.

That in thoughts and acts of daily life
We weave, whether dark or fair,
The garments of light or shadowy folds,
That our spirit must sometime wear.

Time gives a shuttle of wondrous power,
And it weaves as we bid it go,
We may make its threads as dark as night,
Or as white as the drifted snow.

Oh, a wonderful thing is the shuttle of time,
As it passes to and fro,
It catches the light of a sunny smile,
Or the dark, sad look of woe.

And then come tangled threads of strife,
And others bedewed with tears,
And all the sorrows are woven in,
That come with the passing years.

Now beautiful strands of loving thought
Lend the garment silvery sheen,
And noble deeds for charity's needs
Are woven in between.

The kindly acts that we strive to do,
To brighten another's day,
The sheltering rest to a weary soul,
That falters by the way.

All these a beautiful lustre lend,
And the threads run fair and free,
And shimmer and glint like the glistening waves
Of a moonlit summer sea.

And so the busy shuttle of time
Weaves on to the end of life,
But we furnish the threads that are woven in Mingled strands of joy and strife.

Then let us weave with willing hands,
With hearts that are free and light,
And our robes shall shine like the glittering stars
That gem the brow of night.

Inspirational Development.

I have been a reader of your valuable paper for some time by an interchange of other literature with a friend who is a subscriber. It has helped greatly in my spiritual unfoldment. On Tuesday night of this week I was in a dark circle of four (one of the gentlemen a psychometrist) the first experience of the other three of being touched and caressed by spirit hands on cheek, brow and hand, also seeing their lights. After about twenty or thirty minutes light was restored, our palms examined by a powerful lens, and a message for each one of the three was received, written and read. I received two, both announcing that I was soon to engage in public work; that I should have both inspirational writing and speaking developed, in both poetry and prose. In less than one day—before the next night—I sat down in the silence with paper before me and pencil in hand waiting a short time. I received the thoughts of the enclosed poem. Should you deem it worthy a place in The Progressive Thinker I shall be true, and highly gratified.

Yours truly,

DR. L. M. ENTWISTLE.

Message of Love and Peace.

Touched by spirit hands on cheek and brow,
So soft, so full of tenderness,
Mute language never known 'till now,
So gentle was the dear caress,
No morbid fear was in the mind,
Could find no lodgment in the thought,
But a consciousness that true and kind
They were, by messages they brought.

To comfort each and bid us know
Their watchful presence day and night.
While still we tarry here below,
Until the spirit takes its flight,—
To me was given for earthly lot,
And future work, the mission great,
To write and speak the blessed thought,
That on each one the angels wait.

From day to day, from hour to hour,
They never weary, never tire,
Their strength is from a higher power
Whose wondrous works we all admire.
Like them we must unselfish be,
The Christ-love dominate our thought—
Live here to bless humanity,
By loving deeds our hands have wrought.

The sad and lonely need to know,
For all earth's sorrows there is balm;
Instead of nursing earthly woe,
They should be brave, and strong, and calm.
Those morbid thoughts can ne'er bring peace,
They make the earth-life full of gloom—
Those spirits found a sweet release—
Only their clay rests in the tomb.

The time that's spent in brooding o'er
The loss of loved ones is a wrong
To living souls; that need us more;
To them our thought and care belong.
Take heart of grace, act well our part
Guided and blest by spirits bright,
Until with them we shall depart
To dwell for aye where all is light.

THE SEARCHLIGHT.

Good Results Will Follow From Its Use.

To the Editor: I am glad you have turned on the Searchlight again. I hope you will continue to do so until every fraud is shown up.

What would we do without The Progressive Thinker. I can not see how any Spiritualist can be without it. I like to know what is going on in the world in the line of occult thought.

Brother Hodge says in his article, that physical phenomena is the only absolute proof we have of the continuity of life and Spiritualism. I can not agree with him; there is too much chance for trickery. He thinks all other phases can be explained by telepathy, a word used by the A. P. R. Society, the meaning of which being "thought transference," and what is that but a phase of mediumship? Our friends on the other side of life talk to us in that way, which is much more interesting to me than the phenomenal physical phases.

I had an experience some years ago that was published in the R. P. Journal. Mr. Richard Hodgson, at that time was secretary of the American Branch of the English Psychical Research Society. He wrote me in reference to my article, and said what I got from my spirit mother was telepathy between the dead and the living. It matters not by what name the scientists call it, the fact remains the same. We know our friends on the spirit side of life do communicate with us.

You cannot send a message by wireless telegraphy unless every part of the instrument is in good, working order. If you wish for good results with an instrument for spiritual telegraphy, the sitter and medium should be in harmony, and in a passive mood, and if you are honest and sincere in your investigation, you will be successful, providing the medium is sufficiently unfolded psychically to receive messages from our friends who have left the physical form.

Again, Brother Hodge says that the materialized form and the voices through the trumpet are not so easily disposed of. I am not sure of that, brother; there have been quite a number of those forms disposed of lately, and there may be more in the near future.

I think the time will come when there will be no need of a searchlight. When that time arrives our true mediums will have power given them to produce grander and more perfect manifestations.

I remain, your sister in the good work,

Review of Rev. R. V. Hunter's Attack Upon Spiritualism.

A distinctly valuable service to Spiritualists has been rendered by Prof. W. M. Lockwood by publishing in neat pamphlet form his able and masterly reply to the attack of Rev. R. V. Hunter upon Spiritualism. Fairly and squarely he meets and demolishes the doughty Reverend's boldly asserted statements. We opine that the Rev. Hunter and others of his kind will hesitate before they attempt again to demolish Spiritualism, after reading Prof. Lockwood's review.

Additional value is given to this brochure by a striking list of names of Professors, Scientists, Actors, Lawyers and statesmen who accept the facts of modern Spiritualism.

For fifteen cents this valuable pamphlet can be procured of Prof. W. M. Lockwood, 723 Prospect avenue, Buffalo, N. Y.

Lyceums desiring graded lessons can secure the same at the following prices, from J. L. Mussina, 13 East Third street, Williamsport, Pa.: Single copy, 50 cents per annum, in advance; 13 cents per quarter. In lots of 20 or more copies, each 40 cents, in advance; published weekly.

LIFE'S PROGRESSION.

"There is no death; there are no dead."

These words stand out on the cover of Edward C. Randall's new book. They are a challenge to the orthodox world, and through all of its pages runs this challenge to those whose ideas of God, of heaven, of hell, of a future life are based strictly upon the Bible. Yet Mr. Randall believes in life hereafter, based on positive knowledge given him from the living friends passed to the life beyond. Price $1.50.

"Around the Year." A birthday book, compiled from the poetical and prose writings of Ella Wheeler Wilcox, with half-tone illustrations prefacing each month of the year. Price $1.00

LONGING.

(Dedicated to "Rob's" Mamma.)

I sit and look in well loved spots
For that dear form laid low;
All flowers now, forget-me-nots,
And long the way to go.
I listen, too, amid the din,
For just that one sweet tone
I see not, hear not, is it sin
That I weep sad and lone?

Sometimes as through the tears, I see
A fleeting vision glide,
I long to draw it near to me,
And then it leaves my side.
As like an echo to my pray'r,
My inner soul can hear
That dear sweet voice lingering there,
As if to soothe my fears.

The form, the sound is all so vague,
I battle to keep bright,
And on my joy is ever laid
The question, "Is it right?"
Sure naught can fill that vacant place,
But looking UP, I should
Behold and Trust, the Father's grace,
Of Life, and Love and Good.

PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

[Obituaries to the extent of ten lines only will be inserted free. All in excess of ten lines will be charged at the rate of fifteen cents per line. About 7 words constitute a line.]

Mr. G. A. McMaster was born in Oneida county, New York, in 1848, and passed to spirit life from his home in Burlington, Mich., May. 30, 1908; funeral services were conducted by Mrs. Emily D. King, of Tekonsha, Mich.

James B. Richard, who was born Feb. 1, 1842, in the town of Peth, New York, passed to spirit life April 1. Services were conducted by Mrs. Emily D. King.

Mrs. Lucy Blood McMaster passed to spirit life April 24, at the home of her daughter. She was a fine medium. Mrs. Emily King was called to conduct the funeral services, but was sick, and Rev. Frank B. Bachelor officiated.

Passed to spirit life at Downing, Wis., May 8, 1908, Jerusha M. Tefft, at the home of her son. Mrs. Tefft was born April 14, 1814. She was a Spiritualist for many years, and had no fear of the change. She leaves two sons, H. A. Goff, of Downing, and J. L. Goff, of Solidad, Cal. Funeral services were conducted from the home. Floral offerings were very beautiful. Her presence filled the home and she will be missed every hour.

Robert Francis Slocombe passed to the higher life at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Wisker, of Detroit, Mich., aged 48 years, after a brief illness. Surrounded by kind friends, he passed peacefully over. Interment at Forest Lawn Cemetery. Services conducted by Laura L. Crawford.

On the morning of May 5 at Springfield, Mass., Mrs. Eliza B. Wood passed suddenly from earth, aged 76 years. She had been a devoted Spiritualist for more than forty years. She served as secretary of the First Spiritualist Ladies' Aid Society of Springfield for several years. She was loyal to her knowledge of Spiritualism at all times and in all places. She was buried beside her husband and daughter in Springfield cemetery. The funeral services were held in Christ's Episcopal church contrary to her oft expressed wish, that in death she could bear testimony to and for her own religion. This privilege was denied her, as is the too frequent experience of Spiritualists.

HELEN L. P. RUSSEGUE.

In San Bernardino, Cal., Tuesday morning, May 12, there passed to the spirit world Mrs. Adella E. Grant, wife of L. W. Grant, president of the local association of Spiritualists. She had undergone a critical operation and never recovered from the effects. She was born in Oswego, N. Y., and lived for a number of years in Denver. The funeral was private.

E. B.

Passed to the better life at Brookston, Ind., on Monday, May 4, at 2 o'clock a. m., Brother Elijah Wood, a true Spiritualist of many years' standing.

H. H. FROSS.

Passed to spirit life from her home near Cohoctah, Mich., May 4, 1908, Mrs. Susan J. Stelzer. She was a great sufferer though she did not complain. She was a devout Spiritualist and looked forward hopefully to the hour of her approaching transition. She leaves a husband who had been her partner in life's joys and sorrows for more than forty years. She also leaves two sons and two daughters all of whom are comforted by the consoling teachings of modern Spiritualism.

The large farm-house was filled, the verandas and every other available place was crowded with old friends and neighbors who came from far and near to pay their respects to this good woman. The services were conducted by the writer and her wishes were carried out in every detail.

E. W. SPRAGUE.

Mrs. Lilly M. Thiebaud, for three years pastor of the San Bernardino Association of Spiritualists, ascended into a higher sphere, leaving her mortal body May 18, at 2 a. m. Her illness was a long one, but the end was very peaceful. She was for a number of years pastor of the First Church of San Diego, and organized the Progressive Psychic Society of Riverside. The body will be interred at San Diego. Mrs. Ives conducted the funeral services.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Everyone has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected. HUDSON TUTTLE.

Judge O. G. Richards:—Q.—A young man, well connected, with fine prospects, has just been convicted by our court of murdering his wife and two children. How can we explain such horrible crimes?

A.—I suppose the "obsessionists" would explain such atrocities by obsession by evil spirits. Others appear to think "home training" is the most efficient factor. Passing all these, studying the case even superficially will show that none of these are to be considered of importance. The record of all, we make no exception, of the most brutal and horrible crimes shows that they come from the erotic passion. In reading the report of the case in instance, Schuch, the criminal, was a prosperous man, having a wife, a son of 9, and daughter of 3 years of age. His wife left him because of neglect and attentions to another woman. This woman drove with him, the state contended, to the wife's home, where he murdered the three victims by cutting their throats while they were in bed. A more fiendish deed cannot be imagined, yet we see no cause for hesitancy in assigning a cause. The wife and children were in the way, or supposed to be, of the gratification of diabolical passion which completely dominated the criminal It hypnotized him with the one idea of its gratification. Heredity enters this question by the trend it gives the character; home training may "bend the twig" in a direction it would not otherwise grow, and true education may give strength to resist and ability to hold a steadfast course. But there are instances where it seems that physiology and pathology give the cause, and morality and reason are oveborne by the shes force of organic activity. morality and reason are overborne by the sheer force of organic activity. erotic passion, which is the antithesis of love. It may be called insanity, or disease, if insanity be the absorption of the mind by one idea, and disease be abnormal action. Its activity is like insanity or inebriacy, in that the direction of the activity cannot be predicted. But in the fact that it chafes at restraint, we may always expect the most hideous manifestations. Obsession, a handy scape-goat to call in to spread the mantle of sweet charity over crimes that make normal men and women blush. I can see no more need of calling in evil spirits here than to call them to the enraged tiger, or hungry wolf. All the loathsome list of crimes against nature of which decency forbids the mention, are caused by the overwhelming of the reason by the abnormalactivity of erotic functions.

Paul McArthur, President M. S. S. Assn.:—Q.—What is Psychometry? Is it not a misnomer as far as it relates to spiritual seeing, etc.?

A.—All spiritual phenomena of the mental order, rest on sensitiveness, or impresssibility; by this is meant the activity of purely spiritual faculties, independent of the physical senses. Psychometry is only one form of this sensitiveness. The independent clairvoyant perceives with his spiritual senses—the senses pertaining to his spiritual organism—and this perception, as far as it goes, is precisely that of independent, freed spirit.

There does not appear any use for the word psychometry, it being misleading, and sensitiveness, as covering the whole field, is better. Directly, we are spirits confined to physical bodies. Our spirits have the capabilities of spirits, and under favorable conditions manifest these spiritual qualities.

As a receiving instrument of wireless telegraphy, it receives thoughts floated into the spirit ether by other minds—in the body or out. It may gather these waves of thought from a letter or other object, and this is called psychometry. How narrow this field. This sensitiveness means freedom of the spirit from the physical body in ratio of its intensity—even until death is its full and complete separation and it then attains in fulness the use of its spiritual senses, only partially gained in this life.

Hence all "occult" manifestations, trance, clairvoyance, spirit communion, are made possible and depend on the fact that we are a spirit united to a physical body, and the more or less independence of this body the spirit is able to gain. A clairvoyant sees with the spiritual eyes; clairaudience, to hear with the spiritual organs of hearing, and thus to the end. In the study of these mysteries, we must not for a moment forget that WE ARE SPIRITS, and though overlapped by the physical body, the spiritual self is always an important factor.

A Proposal to Do Fraud Work!

Mrs. Jerry Simpson, lately President of a Spiritualist Society at Wichita, Kansas, says she was offered an opportunity some time ago to learn Trumpet Deception in Dark Circles, by paying $50. She declined to accept the proposition. At least one-half of the trumpet work in our ranks is the rankest DECEPTION.

THE CAUSE AT WICHITA, KANSAS.

Mrs. Jerry Simpson, a Prominent Spiritualist, and Thoroughly in Earnest in Promoting Honesty and Purity in Our Ranks, Resigns Her Office.—Denounces a Certain Kind of Commercialism in Our Ranks.—A Communication That Will Interest Spiritualists Generally, as Published in The Eagle, of Wichita, Kansas.

Mrs. Jerry Simpson has withdrawn from the First Spiritualist Society of Wichita, and has resigned as its president. She intimated that fakers wanted to use the society along the lines of commercialism. She would not stand for it, and after watching things carefully for some time she decided to denounce them in open meeting. She did so and it is said that quite a scene followed.

Mrs. Simpson is a sincere believer in scientific Spiritualism, but she does not go much on mediums who try to make people believe that they can get messages from friends in the spirit world through a trumpet. SHE SAID THAT SHE WAS OFFERED AN OPPORTUNITY SOME TIME AGO TO LEARN THE TRICK FOR $50 BUT SHE WOULD NOT LISTEN TO IT.

Mrs. Simpson declares that she watched a medium in that city very closely during her investigations and that it was a case of ventriloquism.

Mrs. Simpson still belongs to the state society that will hold a convention in that city the first week in June—a convention which she herself secured—and is an active and earnest worker in it. Her eyes snapped as she indignantly told a Wichita reporter that it was a shame and a disgrace to see such a splendid thing as Spiritualism commercialized, and therefore degraded.

Mrs. Simpson has written the following explanatory note to the the Eagle on the subject:

Feeling that both myself and my subject are entitled to a word of explanation, I avail myself of this opportunity of addressing the public. As an advocate of the theory, or rather, the facts, of Spiritualism, I find myself subject to more misunderstandings and often, too, misrepresentations, than would seem possible. I have now been an observer, investigator, student, and happy participant in these most wonderful phenomena for a number of years. My investigations have cost me much time and considerable money.

During the earlier years I always saw this subject dismissed from discussion with a wave of the hand, a bit of cutting ridicule, or a superstitious "dangerous, let it alone." But as I grew older and saw many of the world's best scientists and thinkers braving the ridicule in order to help investigate, my attitude toward it changed. AND IT IS A MOST STARTLING FACT THAT NONE OF OUR WISE MEN HAVE EVER QUIT THIS INVESTIGATION AFTER ONCE GETTING THOROUGHLY INTO IT WITHOUT PRONOUNCING IT THE GREATEST WONDER AND A NEW WORLD OF FACT TO BE EXPLORED. Even Gladstone said of it: "The greatest, by far the greatest, work now going on in the world." And what an imposing array of great names it has won. Crookes, whose investigations in electricity and other sciences has made him a world leader and elected him to the presidency of English Royal Society, the greatest scientific body of men in the world, has written a book of his spirit researches that shows him as sure of the facts of Spiritualism as he is of sunshine. Alfred Russel Wallace, the co-discoverer with Darwin of the laws of evolution, has written a book bristling with wonderful Spiritualistic facts discovered by him during years of earnest study.

In our own country we have the two books, the Widow's Mite and the Psychic Riddle, by I. K. Funk, D.D., a man whose scholarly rank is best attested by the fact that his standard dictionary is in many places supplanting our loved Webster. Rev. R. Heber Newton, of the Episcopal church, and Minot J. Savage, D.D., of the Unitarian, are American religious leaders who have taken an open stand for the study of Spirit Return.

Dr. Richard Hodgson spent over fifty thousand dollars for the American Psychic Research Society investigating various mediums. He was one of the world's most skilled psychologists and began as a materialist, expecting to find it all fraud, but ended his years of work with a full conviction of immortality and spirit return. His scientific certainty of future life is best evidenced by his saying, "I can hardly wait to die." And since his death he has identified himself to scientific men in many ways and says, "Things are even better than I expected." And there are hundreds of others of the brightest, the best and the greatest of men whose writings and sayings on this subject are truly enlightening, but space forbids their mention. The public press is slowly opening up to the subject for the people begin to demand it. A good illustration is Hamlin Garland's article on "The Shadow World," lately begun in Everybody's Magazine.

Much of my life has been with the minority. I am proud to regard the husband whose name I bear as a pioneer advocate of the political principles so unpopular and productive of defeat twenty years ago, but which are to-day making our president the most popular man of the age. Though he could not remain in the body to see these principles triumph, of his spirit presence and continuing work for the cause he loved so well I have had the most startling confirmations. And these proofs come not from fortune tellers and schemers for money, but from friends and workers in this field who would scorn to accept pay for their powers, and from those who are developing their psychic power quietly for their own benefit and who would not permit the mentioning of their names. And the number whom I thus find working for the higher development, and the greater results they are getting, and the high character of the persons engaged, would startle the city and the nation.

Being absolutely convinced of the truth of Spiritualism, and not fearing to stand with a minority when I felt to be in the right, and anxious for the sake of truth's advancement to still be of use to the world, I some time ago accepted the presidency of the Spiritualist Society of Wichita. IN ALL MY EXPERIENCES I HAVE FREQUENTLY FOUND THE RANKEST FRAUD. THE GLORIOUS REVELATIONS OF OUR SCIENTIFIC RELIGION HAVE BEEN IMITATED BY THE LOWEST CHARACTERS AND THE WICKEDEST FAKES. AS IN ALL AGES AND ALL RELIGIONS THERE HAVE BEEN THOSE READY TO "STEAL THE LIVERY OF HEAVEN TO SERVE THE DEVIL IN." Before our society we have had some of the brightest and best minds of the day, but also have we found ourselves imposed upon by the most vicious deceit. I have seen some of the best citizens of Wichita come to our meetings full of earnest inquiry for the truths we claim to present, and have watched their expressions change to uncertainty, disappointment, disgust, and contempt for what they received. I HAVE SEEN LITTLE FATHERLESS CHILDREN WITH SOBBING, SORROWING EARNESTNESS HEARTLESSLY DECEIVED BY THE RANKEST FRAUD INTO THE BELIEF THAT THEY WERE RECEIVING MESSAGES FROM LOVING SPIRIT PARENTS. Against all this my soul has cried out "for shame," but for the sake of the society and the truth it is supposed to represent I dared not speak. But I can be silent no longer. It has never been possible to get a majority of the society to see this fraudulence, the necessity for stamping it out, and to see that truth can advance only by the help of absolute truthfulness. For this reason I have resigned and withdrawn from the First Spiritualist Society of Wichita. I retain my membership in the State Spiritualist Society and in the National Society. I also retain my faith in true Spiritualism and again avow my unswerving adherence to its teachings.

The State and National presidents are upright and noble souls, whose highest aim is the advancement of our glorious cause through God's eternal truths. I know they will continue to send here the best teachers and mediums to be found, and will fight with all their energy the corroding fraud that is trying to eat the heart of true Spiritualism.

I agree with Gladstone as to the importance of this work. It is the philosophy of the coming age. It teaches absolutely that whatever we sow we must reap, and we are in eternity now, and that death is but a setting free of the spirit of real self to continue its fight against evil and to advance onward and upward forever. It teaches that our loved ones gone before, instead of resting in some far-off golden-streeted heaven, are as near to us as ever, still working to advance themselves and to help us. It teaches that by our own efforts and the help of the Infinite, and especially by earnest and faithful and soul goodness, and by careful adherence to the, as yet, little known unchangeable laws of soul communication, we may converse with them, as it were, face to face. On rare and exalted occasions our souls may even see their glorious presence. It adds to a waiting world's faith in a future life the certainty of absolute and scientific knowledge.

The subject hardly lets me stop, and I will say more later, but I must close with an earnest invitation to all to investigate the truths we demonstrate and the philosophy we teach. Come to the Unitarian church to-night, corner Topeka and Central avenues and hear a free lecture by our State president. MRS. JERRY SIMPSON.
Wichita, Kansas.

Editorial in the Wichita Eagle.

The discord in the First Spiritualist Society which culminated in the resignation of Mrs. Jerry Simpson from the presidency must end disastrously to the organization, unless Mrs. Bellman, the president of the state society, who will be here to-day, exercises her diplomatic genius in the direction of healing the sores that unquestionably afflict the local society at the present moment. And the prospects of Mrs. Bellman interfering in a friendly and conciliating way are not too bright. This is evidenced to some extent by the fact that she will not appear at the customary headquarters of the society, but, instead, will appear at the Unitarian church, where, it is understood, Dr. Day will personally introduce her.

As a usual thing the public is a little backward in interfering in any way with quarrels in a church, or a society of this kind that tends in a religious direction, but those who are braving the traditional danger of mixing up in family affairs seem to favor the stand Mrs. Simpson has taken, and feel that Mrs. Bellman may so far declare in her favor that she may take away the charter of the society entirely. If she does the state society will be in the embarassing situation of holding its annual convention in a town that has no legitimate organization. Some arrangements might be made for the organization of a society with the patrons of those irregular things that crept into the old society eliminated.

The feature objected to by Mrs. Simpson—a feature said to be objectionable to orthodox Spiritualists—is trumpet communications with the spirits of the dead, and other arts having about them a taint of commercialism. For instance, it is said that the "kid glove act" has been attempted there, or at least that many were in favor of admitting practitioners of that sort into the society—innocently, of course. This is supposed to be the most insidious deception of the jugglery of fake Spiritualism, and the one orthodox Spiritualists fear most from the standpoint of reputation.

Mrs. Simpson has stated, it is understood, that she has been offered instruction in the art of commercial Spiritualism for the sum of fifty dollars and that she investigated the matter sufficiently to justify her aversion to features such as trumpet communications with souls departed.

The claim is also made that the desire of commercial Spiritism to get into societies of orthodox Spiritism—which is the new word for Spiritualism—is based mainly on the fact of exemption from the payment of license fees to incorporated municipalities for the privilege of doing business; for if the business is conducted under the guise of religion it is generally unnecessary to be licensed to transact it.

Mrs. Simpson and her orthodox colleagues believe in "regular" Spiritualism and have sufficient traditional and historical justification for that belief; for it was believed by the Chinese, some forty thousand years ago according to Confucius, that the spirits of the dead manifested themselves to living friends on rare occasions. According to the hieroglyphics found on the ancient ruins along the river Nile it is clear that the Egyptians, as long ago as five thousand years before Christ, believed that the spirits of departed friends returned to commune with the living. The Bible, according to the interpretation of orthodox Spiritualists, appears to be full of positive proof that the spirits of the dead returned to their former earthly scenes and friends, and they make it almost a clear case that Abraham of old was not only a Spiritualist but that he had extraordinary mediumistic powers. The truth is that it is a mighty hard thing to defeat a clever Spiritualist in argument against his belief for one who believes in the Bible and have a respect for the traditions of the past or the scientific researches of the present; for while the latter do not assert the spirit's return, they do not deny that they do, and on the whole psychical scientists prove by their elaborate and costly investigations that they are at least inclined to the theory of the Spiritualists.

The latter claim that their belief is really a universal belief, and that their religion would cover the world were it not for the opportunity there is to practice fraud in its name. That is the reason the orthodox Spiritualists are so anxious to separate themselves from the commercial practitioners., who, they claim, have brought them into disrepute.

It is quite possible that Mrs. Simpson's firm stand for orthodox Spiritualism, as against commercial Spiritualism, may encourage other honest believers to shake off the incubus that oppresses and encumbers true Spiritualism, and retards its progress alongside of other organized efforts to solve the deepest mystery the human mind has ever grappled with, not only by faith, but by and through the human senses. Mrs. Simpson was formerly of Medicine Lodge and people who lived in that remarkable town have so frequently evidenced ability to accomplish things that it need not surprise anybody if she would become a strong factor in the purification of modern Spiritualism.

Consolation and Blessing.

To the Editor: What a consolation and blessing it is to realize that spirit return is a fact. In times of serious trouble and affliction true believers in Spiritualism receive the evidence from the other side of life. My dreams and visions come in the way of type and symbol, but I generally understand their meaning.

About the middle of April I employed our family physician to take our youngest daughter to an expert for an operation in connection with a tumor and appendicitis, and she was to remain in a city hospital until able to return home.

It was a very critical period, and I was fearful of the results. That same night while in a deep slumber, I heard a great noise in the heavens, like a rushing and whirling tornado, and the physician was with me, for I saw him distinctly. We both trembled with fear, and when I looked out upon the sky it was clear, and I saw stars, and the noise that was so dreadful was gone.

I was convinced that all would be well with my child, and believed that the rumblings came from the spirit world.

Everything indicates now that my hopes and anticipations will be realized from the faith I had in the mysterious and figurative phenomena.

Every week I am feasting on the spiritual teachings of The Progressive Thinker, and the good impressions I receive from the spiritual writers and authors, I hope will be as lasting as eternity. May we all meet in the higher spheres is my sincere prayer, when done with this lower sphere.

A VOICE FROM THE SOUTHLAND.

Interesting Notes of Work Done and in Contemplation.

Having just returned from a most delightful visit with the Spiritualists of that beautiful city, San Diego, I have decided to give the readers of The Progressive Thinker a slight insight into the spiritual work which has been accomplished and is in contemplation in that and other sections of our south land. On my arrival at San Diego I was escorted to the Spiritualist Temple, where I found a fine gathering of children in attendance at the Children's Lyceum, which is under the able management of those capable and energetic Spiritualists, Miss Kate Ivanovitch, conductress, and Brother C. A. Buss.

After the morning lesson the children went through a drill and flag raising, the execution of which reflected great credit to themselves and those in charge.

The regular morning service in the Temple was opened by the pastor, Rev. Kate Heussman-Harveston, who delivered a fine inspirational lecture, the subject being, "Body, Soul, Spirit," which proved a lesson of great thought to those present.

The Temple evening service was another grand spiritual meeting, the pastor's subject being "Who, What and Where is God?" which was ably handled by the pastor's controls, who also gave many independent, clear-cut spiritual messages to the large audience present. The Temple Association is surely doing a grand work in their lovely Temple of worship. May long live such noble workers, who are combining every effort to place before the people the truth of Spiritualism and elevate the cause of immortality.

Before the lecture I was called upon to deliver my message to the people of San Diego relative to the Grand Spiritual Congress to be held at Long Beach, commencing Aug. 22. Let me say that the mayor of Long Beach, Cal., has opened the gates of the city and most generously tendered the use of the magnificent and commodious Long Beach auditorium to the Southern California Congress, with the same privileges that in the past have been accorded to the orthodox denominations, which goes to prove that Spiritualism is certainly progressing in this section of California.

We expect, and sincerely desire the co-operation of all surrounding societies and organizations in making the Congress a grand success in the unfoldment of truth and expansion of the doctrine of spiritual immortality.

Now one word for the work in Los Angeles. Spiritualism is advancing with rapid stride, and under the able management of some of our unselfish workers who have devoted their time, money and energy, one of the largest and most prosperous societies on the coast has been built up. I have reference to the People's Psychic Society, Mr. Arthur Prentis, president. This society has grown in less than two years from a few faithful ones to an assemblage of from two to three hundred persons, holding meetings every Sunday morning in the large and commodious Burbank hall. From 9:30 to 10:30 a developing and healing circle is conducted by Dr. W. Green. Following the circle the regular Sunday morning exercises are held, the time being devoted to lectures by such speakers as Hon. J. L. Dryden, Hon. J. C. Craig, and Mrs. Horman Patterson. A great acquisition to the society, and one that has been largely instrumental in building up the organization, through her wonderful inspirational singing, and true womanly devotion to the Cause she loves, is Mrs. Adelaide K. Brooks. If space would permit I should like to speak of other work, and will endeavor at some future time to tell of our Relief Work.

NIGHT MARAUDERS IN PRAYER.

Masked Leader of Kentucky Tobacco Destroyers Kneels to Invoke Divine Protection Before Applying Torch.

Word comes from Lacenter, Ky., that kneeling on the ground in the moonlight with their heads bowed, while their leader, his masked face turned toward heaven, offered prayer, a band of night raiders destroyed the big tobacco barn of H. G. Maddox, not far from that place.

The spectacle was witnessed by Flint Randall and Miss Maggie Tate, two young people, who were returning from a party, and who were captured by the raiders and forced to accompany them to the prayer meeting and barn burning.

After the torch had been applied and the flames were under good headway the young people were led some distance away with instruction to go home, and as they left they heard the strains of "Nearer, My God, to Thee," floating through the air to the accompaniment of crackling timbers and the roar of the flames.

LOOKING BACKWARD FROM MY EIGHTIETH BIRTHDAY.

If I could retrace the trodden paths,
That I have followed through in these long years
There are so many things that I would do
To lessen sorrow and relieve the tears—
So many hours that I would live anew—
And have a kindly word for every one—
So many days that to my backward view,
Record apparent duty left undone—
So many shadows in the darkened sky
I might have banished with the kindly word,
But saw the opportunity go by,
And failed to let approval's voice be heard.
Still with my record I must be content
The fatal errors of my life must stand.
Yet if I could, the years of failure spent
I would retrace with a firmer hand,
Strive for the goal of every duty done;
Friend of the friendless I indeed would be,
And cultivate the love of every one.
I would from every form of vice be free,
And evil ways and habits learn to shun,—
My aim in life the wealth of PURITY.

The Cause in Montana.

To the Editor: I am anxious for the Spiritualists of Montana to know that we will hold our convention in Billings the first Friday and Saturday of June. I know there are quite a number who take The Progressive Thinker, and we will welcome all who will come, and lend us their help. I feel sure if all of the Spiritualists of our state will take hold, we will have a grand convention, and give the warm hand-clasp of true brothers and sisters that we claim to be for the cause of truth. WILL YOU COME or write, and send us your good will. Send in your names that we may come in touch with you of our grand old state of Montana, and let the cause of Spiritualism spread more this year than ever before. We want those who will join our State Association. We need all the help we can get.

I also want to say we had with us for a short time Mrs. DeWolf Kiser, and while she could only stay a short time, she has done us much good. She is a remarkable medium, and she left us with a feeling that we are all better for having met her.

We also had with us for three years the good little medium, Mrs. Eva McCoy, who has worked hard to help us along, and always ready to do all she could. She is now in Butte, working up our interest in that part of the state for the convention, and for three years she has had the love and respect of all who knew her.

The Progressive Thinker is like a true friend. We are always glad for the morning when we know it is coming.

If any of the Spiritualists of our state care to write me, I shall be glad to hear from them. My home address is 220 North 28th street, Billings, Montana.

Unity Camp, Saugus, Mass.

This popular resort for Massachusetts Spiritualists will open for the season on Sunday, June 7, with Rev. Mrs. Pepper-Vanderbilt as speaker. Services will be held every Sunday from that date to Sept. 27. A conference, free to all speakers and mediums, will be held at eleven o'clock, the regular services at 2 and 4:30. Some of the best talent in the country will be present during the season, Oscar A. Edgerly being engaged for June 14, Mrs. Kate Ham for June 21 and other dates later. Miss Elizabeth Harlow will be the speaker on July 5 and 12; Mrs. Carrie Twing one date in August, which will be advertised later. Dates are yet to be arranged with Mrs. Nettie Holt Harding, Frederick Nicholson and other noted speakers. The management are hoping to make several other dates with Mrs. Vanderbilt, which will be advertised as soon as she feels sufficiently recovered from her recent illness to give attention to business matters; at the present writing she is forbidden by her physician to attempt any public work. The music during the camp season will be under the direction of President H. C. Chase, who has engaged the services of a competent quartette and also numerous noted soloists. Refreshments will be served as in former years. The auditorium being floored and roofed, ensures perfect comfort in cold and rainy as well as hot weather. Electric cars bring visitors from Boston direct to the camp gate. The admission is free and every one welcome.

Notes From G. H. Brooks.

My last letter was written from Pittsburg, Pa., this one is written from my home in Milwaukee. In my last, I said I was undecided what my future course should be; that I felt I might give my work up, and turn my attention to something else. My mind is made up on what I shall do. I shall remain right at the helm, and not budge one inch. I am no criminal. I have committed no crime, have only done what was for me to do in my spiritual work, given sittings just like other mediums do, and just as I shall continue to do as long as I am in the work. I am better prepared to do a work I never could do before, because I have a deeper insight into things than I ever had before. While I deeply regret the terrible ordeal which I was called upon to pass through, yet I feel the work has not been interfered with, and there may be a purpose in it all. I have been greatly encouraged in the receipt of letters from friends, who have sent letters of sympathy and good fellowship, and assured me the cause needs me now as it never did before, and so I think, and so for the present I am going to remain in the field and labor in the spread of Spiritualism, and show the world there is a truth that the world needs.

I am going to Lily Dale this summer, and spend a good part of the time there. I speak the first and the last Sunday of the camp. I now intend to take my family, and have them enjoy the season there. I also speak two Sundays at Lake Brady.

I was once more elected to fill the office of president of the Wisconsin State Spiritualist Association. While I preferred to withdraw, and fully intended so to do, yet the Association is not in a condition to turn into other hands, and I felt that the call to duty, and to place our state society in a better condition than it is to-day, was a duty I must fill, so I again allowed myself to be put back into office, and while we are not yet out of debt, we are in a condition to do some work, and as soon as I can in June, shall start out for a short trip, and see what can be done in the state, and I ask the friends everywhere to send for me, and help in this work. We have but few organized societies in the state, and I want, as far as possible, to organize societies, and see that they are looked after. I certainly shall do all in my power to get this work placed before the people in the state. While I am to be absent for awhile this summer, yet I shall arrange for the opening of the work this fall, and see what there is that can be done to extend the cause, and build up societies; I know our people are widely scattered through the entire state; yet I am going to ask each one of the readers of The Progressive Thinker who resides in Wisconsin to send to the secretary of the state, Miss Louise Loebel, 275 23d street, Milwaukee, Wis., your full name and address, and if possible one dollar, and become a member of the state society. In this way you become a part of us, and you then have the advantage of keeping in touch with the state work, and also become a part of the great whole. Your hands are strengthened, also ours. As a state, Wisconsin is away behind many other states.

I also ask those who once lived in this state, and now make their homes elsewhere, that still feel an interest in the Badger state, and in the work, to feel you, too, are also invited, and to give us your name and assistance. I cannot do the work as president of the state society unless my hands are upheld by the friends through the state. I look to you far more than you look to me, therefore, I ask your assistance. I am already at work forming plans for the next convention, which meets here in this city next April. I am intending to have the delegates and friends entertained, as far as it is possible, and hold out as much of an inducement as I can for a much larger attendance than we have ever had. I trust the coming year will see great advancement along our line, and the state society take its place where it should be. The last of this month I am to move, and beginning June 1 my address will be 784 Booth street, Milwaukee, Wis.

Trusting the friends throughout the entire state will come to the front with their words of cheer and help, I am, as ever, the well wisher of all.

G. H. BROOKS,
President W. S. S. A.

The Progressive Thinker.

SPIRITUALISM—Progress, the Universal Law of Nature; Thought, the Solvent of Her Problems.—SPIRITUALISM

VOL. 38 CHICAGO, ILL., JUNE 6, 1908 NO. 967

A VISION OF DEATH.

Sees the Soul Form and Leave the Body.

To the Editor: I saw an article in the Chicago Examiner, where Dr. Rose M. Reading claims she had seen souls leave the body, and that she is a Presbyterian. I am glad she is, for maybe the other denominations will take more stock in her statements.

I, for one, agree with her, for I have witnessed the same phenomenon many times.

My first experience was in October, 1881. I had a very dear friend, a Mrs. Bennett, who passed to spirit life with consumption. I had been the means of converting her to our beautiful philosophy, and was a constant attendant at her home for about three years, and when she had fought the dread disease until a mere shadow, she sent for me, and said: "Dear Mrs. Laraway, I must go. Do come to me. I cannot leave until I see you, for I shall pass from my body at 5 p. m. I arose from a sick bed and went to her home. Another friend, a good clairvoyant, was at her bedside; also her husband and five daughters. After bidding them all good-by they left the room. Mrs. W. and myself remained and as I remember well, the hour was 4 p. m. As we heard the clock strike the hour, she said, "Just one more hour on earth. Oh! I must leave my dear girls so soon! Will you promise me you will as long as you can, keep in touch with them, and teach them the truth as you have taught me?"

I have done so, and now they are all married, and still blessing me. She was conscious to the last, for at 5 o'clock she had taken her flight. She was resting nicely, and said to my question, "Are you in pain, dear?" "Oh, no. I am so happy, so light, and will soon be with all the loved ones. Mother and father, do you not see them. They have come! Throw back the coverlet, I cannot breathe."

We did so, and as her limbs grew cold and the fingers relaxed our hold, Mrs. Wilson and I saw a glimmering substance arise above the body. I can describe it as a grayish vapor. It rose in a mass without shape, and, as it evolved, it took an oblong shape, and moved toward the head and shoulders, and as we watched, it whirled or twisted around, and we could distinctly see it arise and form a cloud above her head; then a cord loosely twisted, and about the size of her head began to gradually lengthen, and her soul began to take on form, and kept moving very slowly in a horizontal position. It finally took an upright position, and then disappeared, but still we could see the cord of life had not been separated, and was growing smaller.

There were several spirits still around her body; all seemed to be waiting for her release, when I heard a spirit voice say, "Our child has arisen, and there is no more suffering for her. Our thanks are due you, for she has gained the victory. No sting of death, but life eternal! You, too, have mastered the great mystery, Death."

Now, is it not worth more than all the gold or all the wealth of this world to know the truth?

I am doing my work in my own quiet way. I go to the homes of those who desire my service, and form circles, and get the members started with whatever phase of mediumship they are best adapted for, and then I leave them to develop their own powers. At present I have five classes, and all doing fine work. One class is getting independent slate writing, materialization, inspirational speaking, and other phases. Loud raps come on the wall and furniture.

I shall not be able to keep up my work longer in my home city, as I go to California in October, and will make my home at Los Angeles.

The good work is going on here in Detroit, for we have many good mediums who are developing; one is a healer. He has done a great work in his own way. He was a pattern maker. For twenty years he had pounded sand, and then his mother came to him and said: "My boy, you have a greater work to do. I am alive, and will help you." They were Roman Catholics, and he has an uncle, a priest, in spirit life who controls him to lecture. He has erected a chapel that he uses for his offices and lecture room. The doors are never closed, and the Catholics and Lutherans are the ones he is converting to Spiritualism. He will look you in the face a moment, and then will tell you whether he can help you or not; if so he will treat you by laying on the hands, and in most cases he heals them. He claims that Pope Leo has come to him three times and told him to do this work. I have always found him truthful. I can see no reason why Pope Leo should not come to him if he has found the truth, and can come in touch with one on earth, why not use him as well as any one? This medium's name is Joseph Trombly. MRS. ANNIE LARAWAY.

A New Musical Medium.

While at Lake Helen the past winter, I had the surprising pleasure of listening to a musical concert given in honor of Mrs. Shirley Hull Sperry, of Sparta, Tenn. Though untaught in musical execution on the piano, yet when under the influence of her musical guides, she executes with charming effect extracts from the musical compositions of the great masters of the first century, and improvises new music to the astonishment of her audiences.

It is only about three years since she began to play under inspiration, yet her proficiency in handling the piano is already equal to most of the experts in the profession.

Young in years and with such a gift, what marvels in musical attainment she will achieve in years to come.

The Father of Modern Spiritualism

Andrew Jackson Davis.—Nature's Divine Revelations, and What Came of Them.

An Interesting Article by Dr. J. M. Peebles.

In these days of doubt and critical analysis—days of research, religious degeneration and reconstruction—days of materialism and loud-mouthed agnosticism, eclipsing faith and questioning the grounds and proof of a conscious existence hereafter, there comes to me a most interesting communication from a gentleman residing west of the Mississippi. He has entrusted me with his name and a brief sketch of his life, social and public, but for reasons which I confess are weighty he does not wish his name to appear in the public press. If he had not given his real name I could undoubtedly have divined it, as I did that of the able writer, "Sargis," of The Progressive Thinker, through my inner clairvoyance, or perhaps a better phrase would be intuitive clairsentience.

The following are extracts from his well-written letters, briefly condensed:

"I commenced investigating Spiritualism in 1873. Its teachings were rational and beautiful, and for thirty years I was an avowed Spiritualist, doing all I reasonably could to advance the cause of Spiritualism by buying books and pamphlets, loaning and giving them away to do missionary work. I opened my home to lecturers and mediums, giving to them money when they needed it. I paid for halls and opera houses for them to lecture in. * * * At length I discovered that lecturers were envious of lecturers, that writers were jealous of writers, and that the most prominent of them diametrically differed from each other upon reincarnation, sex in spirit life, animals in the spirit world, did Jesus Christ exist? etc., etc. All religion is grossest superstition and all "prayers abominations." Witnesses so disagreeing, so diametrically testifying, do not count in courts of equity. Frauds were being detected. Some trance mediums evidently closed their eyes for effect. I do not hesitate to give you tht following names of mediums with whom I had sittings, such as * * * and I found over half of them claiming to be mediums were frauds—simply wretched, tramping frauds. And I became disgusted with the whole movement and decided that I would have nothing more to do with it, at least while things remained in this condition. * * *

"You, Dr. Peebles, have been in the field of Spiritualism, according to your books and biography, over fifty years, which, with your extensive home and foreign travels must have slackened or tightened your convictions regarding intercourse with the dead, and I come to you inquiringly upon this subject. * * *

"I saw Alfred Russel Wallace when he was in this country. I have read his works and the best English literature upon the subject of Spiritualism; and I have thought if the 'Watseka Wonder' was genuine, and if the parties named in the Watseka pamphlet were trustworthy witnesses, and the Divine Revelations purporting to come through the organism of A. J. Davis were authentic, they were all that reasonable man would want to prove immortality.

"I noticed the criticism upon these Divine Revelations from the late Rev. T. L. Harris and another literary gentleman and geologist connected with Spiritualism, exhibiting some little feeling, and leading me to the desire to know more—and to know the full truth about the authenticity of this book, "Nature's Divine Revelations;" and you, from your long years in progressive fields of thought and research must be able to correctly inform me. Necessarily you knew Andrew Jackson Davis, but did you know his scribe, Rev. William Fishbough, he who claims to have written down the lectures as they fell from the lips of young Davis?

"Undoubtedly quite a number of others would like to know about this book, and if you think proper you can use my letter, omitting the name.

"I am most respectfully, YOURS FOR TRUTH."

The above is certainly a very important letter, from a venerable gentleman, thinker, scholar and counselor, I believe, and an old-time Spiritualist. Owing to the fact that I am lecturing every Sunday, writing on another book which I hope to publish in November, and conducting a great deal of foreign correspondence, my reply must necessarily be comparatively brief.

Certainly I knew the scribe of this book, William Fishbough. He was an eminent Universalist clergyman, esteemed for his manly life and great erudition. At this time I was connected as a preacher with the Universalist denomination, and though not officially connected with this sect for these fifty years and more, it has a warm corner in my heart. And never shall I forget that masterful sermon that I once heard preached by the venerable Hosea Ballou in Boston over sixty-five years ago. Grand has been the work of this religious denomination. It took the substitutional blood out of the atonement, cooled down John Calvin's hell, killed Martin Luther's devil, and taught the progression and final restoration of all souls to holiness and happiness. Thin—THIN indeed is the veil between the intuitive faith of the Universalist and the knowledge of the Spiritualist touching immortality. When the Universalists last year gave that splendid ovation to the Rev. Dr. Cantwell in St. Paul's church, Chicago, I was cordially invited to be present, sharing in the honors to be paid to Dr. Cantwell for his long and faithful service to that truth that maketh the soul free from the bigotry of the seventeenth century theology. I knew Dr. Cantwell when he was a lad working in a tailor's shop in Oswego, N. Y., and a noble youth he was—a splendid man he is. But I am wandering.

What do I know about Nature's Divine Revelations? Considerable, for I was intimately acquainted with Partridge, Judge Edmonds, Prof. S. B. Brittan, and the scribe, William Fishbough—and most manly men they all were. Twice I was a guest for a day in the home of friend Fishbough, and when unsolicited by me, and while speaking of these remarkable revelations, he stepped into another room, returning with the original manuscripts, written manuscripts as they fell from the lips of the youthful A. J. Davis when in his superior state. Here they were before my eyes—I saw them, handled them, examined them, and Mr. Fishbough assured me that he had not changed an idea or erased a paragraph, but had now and then transposed a word or sentence, making the meaning more clear, and in doing this he had the approval of the intelligences inspiring Mr. Davis, and further William Fishbough, a most upright, scholarly man, was himself a psychic gifted with visions—impression from the spirit side of life.

Yes, Nature's Divine Revelations were genuine, were authentic, dropping like priceless pearls from the lips of this uneducated young man when in his exalted state of spiritual consciousness, and there was not so much as a transient shadow of deception or fraud connected with these Revelations. Everything concerning this book was as open as the noonday sun, and though wonderfully in advance of the times (1846-7) scientifically, socially and religiously, they were not considered by this seer as an absolute finality. He did not play the pope, did not drop the curtain, insisting that he or his inspiring intelligences were the ultimate rule of all truth.

Andrew Jackson Davis a Spiritualist in the Highest Acceptation of That Word Before Modern Spiritualism, 1848.

In "The Univercoelum and Spiritual Philosopher," lying before me, I read in the second page of the first volume these words written by W. F. Fernald, who, if memory serves me, was a liberal-minded and cultured Swedenborgian:

"Mr. Davis knew not a single thought nor word he had uttered when brought from the magnetic sleep, till he read it in the manuscripts which contained the matter of his own dictation. And certainly we honor the man who has been selected by Divine Wisdom for the medium of such a gift to the world. * * * And we give him the prominence for his book, which is unequaled in the world."

In this great double volume, "The Univercoelum," Mr. A. J. Davis has several article written by himself relating to his visions. In one of these (page 278) speaking of the presence of an exalted spirit, he says:

"His quick perception, sustained by his highly cultivated faculties of intuition and reflection, presented a combination of intellectual powers seldom witnessed. He (this spirit) was a being whom I felt constrained to love—for love was prompted by his superior wisdom. And it is a truth that I conversed with him and he with me for a long period, and that, too, by a mutual influx and reflex of thoughts."

This spirit then "described his life on earth to Mr. Davis when in the form"—that is, in the mortal body; and all through his exhaustive writings he speaks of converse with Galen, Swedenborg, James Victor Wilson and with delegations of spirits. And right here I feel to quote the words of that very clever English writer, Mr. Wake Cook:

"There can be no question as to the right of Mr. Davis to the title of 'The Father of Modern Spiritualism,' as that grand system cannot be limited to any one means of communicating with the spirit world."

The late eminent Stainton Moses wrote as follows in the English Psychological Review, page 198:

"Permit me to close my review in the words of the gifted A. J. Davis. This noted seer often saying that Spiritualism has evolved nothing new in ethics or morals exclusively its own, adds: 'Upon this principle I hold that it is immoral to use spirit phenomena for any purpose other than as evidence of person immortality. As soon as you receive such essential evidence, that the doctrine of a future existence is founded in reality, it immediately becomes immoral to intemperately indulge in circle-holding and cumulative evidences to the neglect of important work in other directions.'"

Further, this gentleman's letter referring to "Nature's Divine Revelations," mentions the "Watseka Wonder." It gives me pleasure to state in words most positive that the "Watseka Wonder" was a Watseka occurrence of facts—psychic facts attested and witnessed for by the Roff family, by Dr. Stevens, a prominent magnetic physician, and confirmed by the testimonies of reliable neighbors. And still further, I treated Mr. Roff during a severe illness—was a guest in the Roff family—lectured upon Spiritualism in Watseka, and had the general and minute particulars of these remarkable phenomena from Mr. Roff himself, from his highly intelligent daughter, Mrs. Alter, and the neighbors who witnessed the phenomenon of Mary Roff taking possession of and dwelling for a time in the spirit-vacated body of Lurancy Vennum. This Watseka subject is more fully elaborated upon in the volume, "The Pathway of the Human Spirit" (pages 139 to 143).

Does someone say to the above, "IMPOSSIBLE!" Read the rebuke that Huxley gave to those whose narrow vision exclaims "IMPOSSIBLE!" Presume not to do this until you have numbered the electrons in the mountains and counted and comprehended the stars that glitter in the immensities of space.

There is nothing impossible or unnatural in the marvelous facts connected with Mary Roff and Lurancy Vennum when it is considered that the human body is no more the real man than the egg-shell is the real chicken. The conscious, intelligent spirit builds the body, controls the body, owns the body, and under certain conditions, for some wise purpose, aided by heavenly intelligences it may leave it for a season, save by the etheric cord that sympathetically connects it with its mortal tenement. If a human being should build a house for and about himself that he could not get out of until chopped into by a neighbor, or torn down by some terrific cyclone, we should pronounce him either silly or insane. It is the testimony of oriental sages and multitudes of clairvoyant sensitives that the human spirit—an entity, a unit of life, a center of conscious force—can and does leave the body at times, traversing the overarching higher regions, and returns to its physical tenement; and this—all this, before the final separation by death.

Mary Roff, the spirit, when residing in the body of Lurancy Vennum, could not bear to look at the buried and decayed body, once here, now transferred to the bosom of Mother Nature.

Personally, I have already had over twelve material bodies, each of from four months to seven years, disappearing through the excretions; and just where these atomic secretions now are I neither know nor care. And further it is to be hoped that over my last disrobed deposit, if buried, none will lay over the crumbling remains a marble slab, or rear a monument, thus preventing a wavy grass-growth, or the ripening of flower-seeds to feed the passing birds.

But I am wandering—and why not? The field is the world—and my parish encircles the globe.

As germane to Dr. A. J. Davis being the Father of Modern Spiritualism, I beg to state that I have before me a neatly preserved and most interesting letter from his pen, dated Orange, N. J., April 11, 1877. It relates in part to my taking with me "greetings and little packages" from him to the Spiritualists of England, as I was about to cross the waters the second time to deliver some lectures in London, Manchester and other cities. Here are some of the paragraphs, showing the true inwardness of his life position and purpose:

I. "Through your kindness, I send over the seas greetings fresh from the heart of love and good will."

II. "I send them the earnest prayer that the progress of Spiritualism and their growth into its divine principles may be as firmly rooted as the forest trees in the solid earth."

III. "I send the sincere hope that the leaves and fruits of these trees will be Harmonial, and practically for the 'healing of nations.'"

Writing later in this letter of the Anacalypsis about to be published by James Burns, and of the Pymander which I had reviewed in "The Age," he remarks: "Clearly does this show how exactly the human mind makes a circle every three or four thousand years in the declaration and perfection of ideas."

All honor then to Andrew Jackson Davis (and his exalted, inspiring intelligences), the legitimate father of rational and religious Spiritualism, the broad, immutable principles of which are in perfect accord with Nature's Divine Revelations and the Harmonial Philosophy.

WHEN AGNES LEFT US.

When Agnes left us, all the world grew dark,
And gloom reigned in our hearts from grief they bore;
And to our pleas, came not of light one spark,
That to her loves the Christ would her restore;
Her baby-girl, torn from her tender breast,
Wept, there denied sweet nourishment and rest,
Her little boy, she loved so, wondered why
Mamma came not, and what it meant to die?

He who had chosen her as his fair bride,
When she passed on, he laid down earthly hope,
Alone in soul, o'er life's rough seas to ride,
Just waiting, for some strong, wild wave to ope
To him the way beyond its rush and roar,
And he awake to find her on a shore
Where death durst never come to mar one's gladness, and
They two go journeying higher, hand in hand.

INFORMATION WANTED.

On What Authority is "Huldah, the Prophetess," Called a Witch?

In Mr. Mangasarian's lecture on "How the Bible Was Invented," in replying to Hilkiah's discovery of "the Book of the Law," he thus spoke:

"When the king heard this extraordinary news, he must have doubted the word of the high priest, for he appointed a committee, whose names are given in the Bible, to present a report about Hilkiah's discovery. What did this committee do? Did it study the book? Did it invite native and foreign scholars to pronounce about it? Did it encourage the noblest, bravest, most truthful men and women in the world to express their free opinion about it, or to cross-examine the high priest? Indeed not! THE COMMITTEE TOOK THE BOOK AND WENT TO A MEDIUM. They believed that the prophetess, Huldah, the medium, or the witch, was the sole person capable of passing upon the genuineness of inspired documents. No thinker, no conscientious student, patiently collecting facts, and fearlessly exposing error, could compare with the witch, Huldah, in inspiration. She was to the Jewish nation, at this time, what Plato and Aristotle were to the heathen Greeks. Huldah, the medium, represented the highest culture of the country and its people. The confidence of Rev. Minot J. Savage, Rev. Heber Newton and Publisher Funk in Mrs. Piper, is not a circumstance to the faith of King Josiah's committee in Prophetess Huldah. She satisfied the committee that Hilkiah had discovered the real Book of the Law."

It would be interesting to know upon what authority Mr. Mangasarian designates Huldah as a "witch." He surely has no more Bible authority for doing so than he has for calling the woman of Endor a witch. It is true that in the heading of the 28th chapter of 1st Samuel, the woman of Endor is called a witch, and it is stated that Saul having destroyed the witches, now in his fear, forsaken of God, seeketh a witch. He could not then have destroyed all the witches if the woman of Endor was one. But these headings of Bible chapters are not to be considered as Bible or any part of it. Originally, the Bible was not divided into chapters or verses, and these headings of chapters are by no means a part of, or equal to their texts. The woman of Endor and Huldah may have been considered witches by the writers of the Bible, but the Bible itself does not say that they were witches.

"Huldah, the medium, satisfied the committee," says Mr. Mangasarian, and, we may add that Mrs. Piper, the medium, and many other mediums of the present day are satisfying the committees of the American Psychical Research Society composed of such men as Professors James, Hyslop, Coues, Gibier, Hodgson, Lombroso, Crookes, Wallace, Flammarion, Tuttle, Howe, Barrett, Austin, Peebles, Warne, Funk, Savage, and scores and hundreds of other noted scientists and preachers, that it is not only possible, but that the so-called dead DO actually come back and communicate with their embodied friends. Yes, the mediums of the present day, like Huldah, are "satisfying the committee," and all that is necessary for the committees to do is to keep right on investigating and it will not be long until the truth of life beyond death will be unquestionably established.

THE HOME TYRANT.

What thinks the maiden, man or dame
Who seeks to wreck sweet virtue's name
With words and deeds; besmirch, malign;
Debase the soul, the soul divine
Of heaven born in earthly mould;
With purity its native gold.

Why seeks a man with pleasant smile
The world to win, when all the while
A tyrant with a stern demand;
A crushing word and cruel hand
Within the home, where love should reign,
And peace and harmony obtain.

Why seeks a man whose faithful wife
Has sought to live a peaceful life,
To hold her 'neath an iron heel,
And smother every heart appeal
Of his companion—mother, too—
With gossip's cloud of darkest hue?

'Twere quite enough for one to be
A target of society,
Without a jealous husband's claim
Against a true companion's name.
'Twere quite enough in life to bear
The true, without the false to share.

Who seeks to crush to build himself
Must sometime find misfortune's shelf.
Who walks upon the weak to rise,
All heedless of their pleading cries,
Must sometime meet his fate and pause
Before old Justice and his laws.

Cursed be he whose shameless sham
And scandal would another damn!
Thrice shame on him whose own false life
And words pull down a loving wife!
Nor earth nor heaven e'er should claim
The wrecker of fair woman's name.

There is not the least necessity in trying to prevent people from thinking. They are quite ready enough to be stupid or indifferent without any external inducements. THINGS IN GENERAL.

"Instead of There Being a God of Changeless Perfection, From Whom a World of Change and Evil and Decay Has Arisen, Either Through Emanation or Creation, Existence is Self-Originating, Self-Directing, Self-Dependent, Self-Criticising. Things Are No Longer Subject to the Caprice of Gods, but Fixed Rules. Both Material and Spiritual Processes Follow Inviolable Law," So Says Prof. Foster.

Many have been my changes and experiences in the last year. As the old Methodist saying, I have been on the mountain top, and also in the valley. Sometimes, when it seemed that my very life was being crushed out, and that my release from the mortal was almost accomplished, and then again most unexpectedly, but very pleasantly I would be translated to such a height that I would get a glimpse of some who have passed the borderland. I love to recall such scenes and experiences to my mind, and live some of them over again, if possible. My sadness and perplexity of soul I try to put behind me.

Having to be away from home all last summer, the meetings in the Progressive hall were discontinued, but we made many pleasant and agreeable acquaintances; also made the way possible for some good meetings at which the beautiful philosophy of Spiritualism was set forth in all its purity by able and efficient speakers.

It seems to me if there ever was a time when the Searchlight was wanted to be turned on, it is at the present time. This surely is the time that tries men's souls, and while I am sure that The Progressive Thinker is doing more good to expose ignorance, superstition and fraud than any other one means that I know of, yet I can say with Professor George B. Foster, of Chicago, that "these things have to be fought out in men's own souls."

Friends, would men who have not the good of humanity at heart, lay in their beds all night without sleeping, and meditate ways and means whereby mankind may be free? Unless checked by a mighty effort, millions of innocent women, children and men will go down to paupers' graves.

Look at the thousands of dollars given to see rag-babies and inflated rubber images in materializing circles, and then the thousands and thousands of imitators talking through tin horns, and orthodox societies running as chartered Spiritualist societies.

Turn on your searchlight! In other words, if it will make it more forceful, "RAISE H—LL."

If we were to move into a community where they knew nothing about fraud, deception, and Christianity, we would have nothing to do but preach the words of wisdom and truth in all its purity. If we move onto an old farm where the buildings are dilapidated, no frame work or foundations,—suppose you wanted to supplant these old buildings with nice, neat, solid buildings, what would be your first act? I would tear down and remove all rubbish; then I would dig down and lay a solid foundation upon which to place the new structure, which is nature and nature's laws.

Once we get rid of fraud and deception, religion or Christianity (they are synonymous) we will not have to be "raising h—ll" all the time. Then, and not till then, will a heaven be evoluted. Happiness cannot exist where such deception is held in the minds of the people. Again, these are things that are fought out in men's own souls.

Let us study the great principle of life. All is life! There is no principle of death—there is no death.

Let us live consecrated lives, consecrated to truth and right. Let us seek the brighter lights in the spiritual and physical planes. Let us pay heed to that sweet voice. We sense the presence of the spirit entities with us much of the time. If we could live in harmony with nature and nature's laws, we could see them and converse with them the same as with the material; but we are all so much more material than spiritual that many of us will have to wait till we put off this old material body. My prayer is that we may all work for one grand object, the education of the mentalities or consciousness of the human family. When that is accomplished, there will be no more wars, no starvation, no oppression, no slavery; all will be peace, freedom, happiness, joy.

Let me close by quoting again from Professor George B. Foster:

"Instead of these being a God of changeless perfection, from whom a world of change and evil and decay has arisen, either through emanation or creation, existence is self-originating, self-directing, self-dependent, self-criticising. Things are no longer subject to the caprice of gods, but to fixed rules. Both material and spiritual processes follow inviolable laws."

To Mediums and Spiritualists.

Do you not think it the proper thing to be recognized by some organization? One thing is certain, every medium who has the Cause at heart and wishes it to progress, should make it a duty to take out a Medium Certificate from the Chicago Spiritualist League at once, for such certificates are recognized authority that you are endorsed by a religious society which is also recognized by the city as a power that is working in the only way to uplift our Cause; and it is an honor to be identified with the society. Think it over. Every Spiritualist should be a member to help us along in our work. We do not talk, but do.

FIRST CLASS IN ALL RESPECTS.

The Chicago Spiritualist League and the Police Department Investigate Mrs. Isa Cleveland, and are Highly Pleased With the Spirit Manifestations.

About five weeks ago a committee was appointed to investigate Mrs. Isa Cleveland's ballot-work at one of her regular circles. The committee was composed of the Executive Board of the Chicago Spiritualist League. The committee arrived at Mrs. Cleveland's house at 8 o'clock, and was assigned to the parlor, and was asked to write questions, which each one of the committee present did. Brother Griffen took a piece of paper, went to one end of the room and wrote his question in short-hand, folded it up and put it in his pocket. Dr. Wilkins wrote his question and kept it in his possession. Mr. Sidwell did the same, so did Mr. W. J. Lynn, and the writer of this article wrote his in the Pawnee Indian language. After the committee had the questions all prepared on paper which they furnished themselves, respectively, they were invited into another room where Mrs. Cleveland sat, blindfolded, behind a large dining-room table. Fearing that the medium might see from beneath the blindfold, Mr. Griffen took a handkerchief and tied it over the other blindfold to make sure she could not see. Then the committee were seated around the room, and all laid their questions upon a table. The medium reached out and took from the table one of the questions to be answered, without knowing where the committee sat or whom the committee was composed of. She answered the question written in short-hand, describing the spirit to whom the question was addressed, to the entire satisfaction of Mr. A. M. Griffen, who wrote the question and said it was one of the best demonstrations he ever saw. Dr. Wilkins said that his question was answered satisfactorily, and that it was wonderful. Mr. Sidwell was almost astounded at the answer. Mr. W. J. Lynn was more than pleased with the answer of his question, and the writer's question, which was written in the Indian language to an Indian chief, was answered, the medium describing the chief accurately, and answering the question correctly. The committee were more than pleased at the result of Mrs. Cleveland's demonstration, and granted her a certificate entitling her to mediumship for ballot work in the Chicago Spiritualist League.

About three weeks after this meeting, the writer was asked by a prominent detective of the police department if he could take the detective and two others to a prominent medium who was recognized by the League as doing honest work so that he and others could see how the work was done. Knowing of no other medium who had a certificate from the League doing ballot work than Mrs. Cleveland, the writer asked permission to accompany these parties to her house, which she gladly and willingly consented to. So the evening was appointed, which was that of May 22. The writer and the three parties mentioned and about nine others were present. The same procedure was carried out in asking and answering questions as above mentioned. The three parties with the writer and A. M. Griffen were astonished at the remarkable work performed and the way in which it was conducted. Every question was answered correctly. And it gives me great pleasure in being able to recommend Mrs. Cleveland's work, with the sanction of others present, as being the best demonstrations any of us have ever witnessed, and the writer has witnessed a great many demonstrations, but none were subjected to the test-work that Mrs. Cleveland was put to. I advise all skeptics to witness some of her demonstrations before censuring her in any manner.

Yours for honesty,

MODERN SPIRITUALISM,

Fifty-six pages, by Palemon C. Mills, of Seattle, Washington.

A little booklet bearing the above title has recently come to hand. It is tastefully bound in paper and gives evidence of excellent press work. The subject matter deals with the life experiences of the author, Rev. Palemon C. Mills, a prominent Spiritualist minister now residing in Seattle, Washington.

The author's brief reference to his birthplace and his experiences as a boy will be of interest to all who know what New England farm life means. Mr. Mills has told this part of his history in a very pleasing manner and his readers will be carried back to their earlier lives as they read his words.

The strongest chapters in the book have to do with his experiences in the army and his introduction in Spiritualism. He makes no assumptions as to his own abilities in any respect, but shows that he went forth to battle for his country's flag with the sole hope of being of real service to his country. He speaks of his promotions from the ranks to his lieutenancy, grade by grade, with that modesty which characterizes a true man. He made a good record and this soldier hero should be remembered by the government at Washington so long as he stays in mortal form.

The story of his experiences with doctors and his conversion to Spiritualism is one of marked interest. His recovery, largely due without doubt, to the influence of spirit helpers, led him into the spiritual ministry as an active supporter of our uplifting religion. His frequent references to phenomenal work will prove of interest to those readers who prefer phenomena of philosophy, yet when these stories of Mr. Mills are interpreted in their true light they will lead one to the large storehouse of spiritual instruction. Taken as a whole, the book is worth reading and should be purchased by all Spiritualists who are interested in the welfare of their public workers, especially in one who served his country faithfully in the civil war, who worked without money and without price for his religion in days that tried his very soul. The book can be ordered of Mr. Mills, direct at his home, 6067 Fourth Avenue, N. E. Green Lake Station, Seattle, Wash.

A Departed Wife's Intervention

An Interesting Narrative of Incidents Occurring in India.

I heard the present story from the late Rai Bahadoor R—— a distinguished officer of Government and a highly respected member of the Indian Society. One of his sons, whom we shall call G——, had gone to England for education. He came out as a barrister and joined the Calcutta bar. He lost his wife and intended remaining a widower, but could not quite keep his resolution. Although a Hindu, he had, like so many England-returned Indians, no faith in the religion of his forefathers, and fell in love with an Indian Christian girl. His father and mother were still living, and though they strongly objected to the proposed alliance, their voice was lost upon their son.

"Now, one evening, G——, with his affianced and her two sisters, drove in a trap to the Eden Gardens at Calcutta for a walk. After an hour or so the party again got into the trap with a view to return home, when the horse got frightened, apparently at seeing something, and bolted at a furious pace, with the result that both G—— and his would-be wife received severe injuries and lost all consciousness, while the latter's sisters, to the surprise of every one, escaped with only a few slight bruises. G——, who lived separately from his father, was taken in an insensible state to his own house, in the eastern side of the town. As regards his affianced, her condition was even worse than that of his own, and she was carried to her father's place more dead than alive.

The incident naturally gave a rude shock to the friends of G—— and his father, especially as the latter himself was at the time laid up with serious illness. Considering our very intimate friendship with both, we had to make daily inquiries about G——'s condition, and were grieved to learn that he showed no progress towards recovery. On the fifth or sixth day after the accident, information was, however, brought to us that G——'s case had taken a favorable turn and that in the opinion of his medical attendants he was out of danger. But the following day we were startled to learn that G——had expired.

A few days after G——'s death I went to pay a visit to his old father, who, I thought, must have been completely prostrated by the sad bereavement. Rai Bahadoor R—— had then considerably recovered from the effects of his own illness, though he was yet confined to his room. On seeing me he did not show any emotion or shed tears as I had expected he would, but sought to console me when he found my own eyes moistening. "Look here, M——," said he, addressing me, I now fully realize that I have spent my whole life in vain. You know how passionately attached I was to my boy, G——, and how distracted I got now and then at his wayward conduct. But will you be surprised to learn that instead of mourning over his death I rejoice at it, because of the wonderful change this great misfortune has worked in me? I was practically an atheist. I had no faith in the goodness of God. But I now know that my dear son exists, nay, he is with his devoted wife. Well, if we live after death, not alone but with those whom we love, is not God then very good? Does He not thereby proclaim that He is a loving Father, and not a cruel monster as a bereaved parent may be led to regard Him? How blind was I all this time?" And he wiped the tear that started in his eyes.

He paused a little and then went on in the following strain:

"When I heard of G——'s precarious condition, my brain reeled and I thought I was about to die. It seems I swooned away. In that condition I saw a being, robed in light, who approached me and said, 'God is good. Realize this fact and be happy. As for your son, why do you weep for him when he is going to a better world?' Was it a dream? How can you say so when it has made a new man of me? It seems to me I have been born over again—with another mind, another heart. But to proceed. When I awoke I felt an inexpressible joy passing through my system. Of course, all hope of my son's recovery was gone, all the same I was happy.

"In the meantime G——'s case became more and more hopeless. I could not stir out but my wife saw him constantly. At night, an old servant of G—— nursed and watched him. One morning this man came and said to me, 'Sir, I am afraid my young master will not recover.' 'Why do you say so?' I inquired. 'Because,' said he, 'I find his deceased wife almost constantly sitting by him at night. She was perfectly visible to me and it seemed as if she were nursing my master and conversing with him, though he lay unconscious all the time.'

On the fifth or the sixth day of his illness, the Rai Bahadoor added, G——'s medical attendants gave out that he had regained full consciousness and passed the crisis. Just then a message was brought to him from the Christian lady whom his son was to marry. The Rai Bahadoor was given to understand that she had not yet recovered her senses; but though lying unconscious, she had asked her people to listen to and take down what she had to say and then report the whole story to the Rai Bahadoor. They then related to the latter the purport of her message, which was to the following effect:

"I found myself transported to another world," said the lady to her friends, who were nursing her, "where I saw many people, and amongst others, a Hindu lady who described herself as G——'s wife. The latter took me severely to task for my attempt to win her husband and marry him. She also chastized me for trying to convert a Hindu to Christianity and thereby endanger his soul. She further said that she had done her best to prevent her husband from being won over by me, but when she found that he was determined to marry me in spite of her efforts, she had no alternative but to resort to some violent means to separate us and secure his salvation. She, therefore, followed the trap in which G—— had driven to the Eden Gardens with me and my sisters and waited till we returned from our walk and occupied it to return home. Just as G—— had taken the reins in his hand, her apparition appeared before the animal, which took fright, bolted and threw all of us out. It was not her intention, she said, to kill any of us but do such bodily injury to me as would prevent my forming matrimonial alliance with G——. She had no grudge against my sisters and they, therefore, were practically unhurt. She was glad that my life was safe, and that I should recover without any physical deformity. She was angry with me when I sought to deprive her of her husband; but she bore me no hatred or malice now that her husband was coming back to her. She said her husband had no chance of recovery; indeed, he would pass over and join her in course of this very night, though for a few hours he would gain his consciousness and look all right. She expressed great joy at the approaching death of her husband; for, said she, he was bound to go astray were he to remain on earth, while in her company, he would overcome all his erring tendencies and become a jewel of a man. She insisted on my reporting our conversation to G——'s father immediately."

And you know," said the Rai Bahadoor addressing me, "that G—— really left us for the other world the same evening."

In addition to the above the Rai Bahadoor also told me the following story. His second son was at this time employed under government in some district of Eastern Bengal. He was in the interior when his brother, G—— met with the fatal accident, and knew nothing about it. One night this second son had a strange dream and wrote to his father, inquiring as to what it might mean. He was fast asleep at dead of night when G——'s wife appeared before him with a face beaming with delight and dressed in bridal apparel. She had red vermillion in her sitha and conch and steel bracelets on her wrists, as if she had just been married. The Hindu reader knows that a Hindu girl, when married, must use vermillion at the parting of hairs on her forehead, called sitha, and put on bracelets and a red-bordered Saree. "G——'s wife," so wrote the Rai Bahadoor's second son to his father, "approached me with a laughing face and then laughed and laughed without speaking a word to me. She then accosted me and said, 'Don't you see, I am just married again? I left your brother, G——, behind and passed my time here as a widow. What a lonely and cheerless life I had to bear! I also felt unhappy, as my husband was not following the right path. But I have got him back—he has joined me, and I have therefore appeared before you in this bridal dress.' Having said all this, she again laughed merrily and disappeared."

It is scarcely necessary for me to state that the Rai Bahadoor was incapable of inventing these stories, especially when they related to his own son and daughter-in-law. He had no motive in doing so, for it was never his intention these should be published for the information of the public. It should also be borne in mind that he was not only a man of strong common-sense and vast learning, but a thorough skeptic, who had no faith in the existence of a life after death. The testimony of such a man has its special value.—Mati Lal Ghose, in the Hindu Spiritual Magazine.

OPPOSITION FROM BAND OF FAKERS.

Pastor of First Spiritualist Church Indorses Cottel's Ordinance.—Gives Public Protection.—Weak-Minded Now at Mercy of Conscienceless Dabblers in the Occult.—Heartless Work of Fake Mediums in Perpetrating Swindles.

The following is from the Oregonian of Portland, Oregon, and furnishes another object lesson for Spiritualists:

Harrison D. Barrett, pastor of the First Spiritualist Society, heartily indorses Councilman Cottel's ordinance forbidding the practice of clairvoyancy and kindred arts for fraudulent purposes. Mr. Barrett contends that the ordinance is a just and progressive measure, for the protection of the public from a conscienceless band of fakers. Discussing the pending ordinance last night, Mr. Barrett said:

My attention has been called to an article in The Oregonian of Sunday morning relating to the now famous ordinance introduced by Councilman Cottel at the last meeting of the body of which he is a member. I want to corroborate the statements made by Dr. Cottel in regard to the introduction of that measure. He was not, as he well stated, the author of the measure. He presented it in compliance with the request made by many people who are believers in the higher Spiritualism that is now occupying the attention of the savants and scientists of the world. The document was handed to him by one of the members of the council who asked his opinion. He simply marked it "By request," and passed it on. This was a most courteous act on his part, and was certainly appreciated by those who are benefitted by the provisions of the measure.

What does this new ordinance provide? First, it repeals the present ordinance compelling ministers of the religion of Spiritualism, ordained according to the usages thereof, to pay an unjust license fee of $60 a year. It places them, by this repeal, upon equal footing with the clergymen of other denominations. Why should Spiritualist ministers and their friends take exceptions to the repeal of the measure that now discriminates against them so unjustly?

In the second place, it wisely prohibits charlatans, counterfeiters and all-round fakers from advertising for the purpose of entrapping the unwary to filch from them their hard earnings. It does not prohibit the practice or use of psychic powers in any way whatsoever. It does not prohibit ministers of any denomination from filling their vocations according to the spirit of wisdom that is given unto them. It does not make mediumship a felony; nor does it declare that people shall not receive advice in business affairs if they wish to do so. It is simply a wise, just and progressive measure, designed to protect people from the machinations of those who have no consciences and are merely seeking to exploit the people out of their dollars.

This ordinance does not interfere with any newspaper, but it does prohibit counterfeiters using the columns of the newspapers to advertise their wares. The penalty is upon the counterfeiters, and not upon the paper.

It proscribes the obtaining of money and property by fraudulent devices and practices in the name of any religion in the city of Portland. Can any honest man or woman take exceptions to this prohibition or to the infliction of penalties in case it is violated?

It proscribes the holding of any public or private meeting in the name of Spiritualism, or any other religious body, at which fraud or deception of any kind is introduced or allowed to be practised. Is it possible that there is a Spiritualist in the city of Portland who objects to this proposition. Is there any honest man or woman who can take exception to it? For one, I deem it a most beneficent and helpful police regulation, and I trust that our council will pass the measure as it stands, with such amendments as will fit it to the state law of Oregon.

In this city within the last few years a wealthy citizen who stood high in the esteem of his friends and neighbors was victimized by a designing woman, inveigled into a marriage with her and induced to turn over to her all of his property. As soon as she obtained the property she turned him adrift and left him to the cold charity of the world. He had no redress; the law would not protect him. He had to leave the city, and is now in exile in a distant city, depending upon the charity of his friends for his living. It is to prevent such crimes as this that this ordinance is further sought.

A gentleman called upon me to-day and informed me that he was cognizant of the fact that a certain servant girl who had saved $600 by hard labor became the unconscious victim of one of the glaring advertisers in this city, lost all of her money and was rendered helpless and homeless thereby. Is it possible that there is a person in this city who will sign a remonstrance against an ordinance designed to prevent such fearful crimes as this?

I know that some of these loud advertisers have hired agents to locate aged and wealthy widows and widowers to induce them to visit these wicked counterfeiters, whose business it becomes to exploit them. A leading attorney in the city informed me that he knew of one man who was offered $500 to do this work in respect to two individuals only. Shall such things go on unrebuked at the hands of the clean-thinking citizens of this metropolis of the Northwest.

Men and women who are heart-broken, in search of comfort for their bitter sorrows, occasioned by the death of some loved one, are led by these glaring advertisements to the parlors of these conscienceless fiends and there deliberately robbed in the name of their sacred dead. Shall such practises longer pass unnoticed? God forbid that such should be the verdict of the citizens of Portland.

Many instances are on record where men and women have been induced to place gold, silver, precious jewels and valuables of all kinds in the hands of these fakers in order that the same might be magnetized and draw unto their owners more of this world's goods and attract to them the spirits of their loved ones in the Kingdom of God. At one time there were not less than 57 of these rascals plying their trade in Portland.

At a public meeting last night I was publicly denounced for opposing fraud and chicanery by advocating the passage of this ordinance which means the cleaning up of the civic life of our great and progressive city. Remonstrances were introduced in no less than two church societies and honest people were induced to sign them on the ground that the ordinance was class legislation and an interference with sacred individual rights. Those who have signed these remonstrances have thereby arrayed themselves on the side of the people who are fleecing their fellow citizens and destroying their peace of mind.

Saturday evening a friend of mine, prominent in business walks in Portland, sought me and cautioned me against taking further action in this matter on the ground that I would be slugged by some of the fraternity when I was not on my guard. Is it possible that people of Portland are willing to sign papers in support of the slugger and against those who are seeking to remove him from the confines of our fair city?

This nefarious gang is ubiquitous. Its name is legion. It has its grips, signals, passwords, vocabularies, books of exchange, paraphernalia, and all other things that belong to the realm of legerdemain. Honest men and women have signed papers remonstrating against the removal of these tricksters from our midst. As a citizen and a clergyman, I ask that the right be sustained and that the hands of our city council be upheld in the good work they are seeking to do for us. Let us go to them en masse and ask for this very necessary and helpful legislation.

In conclusion, let me say that the First Spiritual Society of Portland, at its last session, 300 people being present, unanimously voted to request the passage of the ordinance and directed its pastor to go before the proper committee to urge its adoption. It is to be hoped that other churches will follow the praiseworthy example thus set for them.

Greenfield, Mass.

The Greenfield Progressive Spiritualist Society is about closing a very successful season. Once a month social meetings have been held with local talent, the pastor, Rev. R. F. Churchill, and the president, Francis Bailey Woodbury, always have good audiences when announced to speak. Mrs. Helen Temple Brigham, who has a summer home in this county, filled a most successful engagement here recently, as did also Edgar W. Emerson.

May 24 Rev. R. E. Birks, pastor of the historic Unitarian church of Deerfield, Mass., conducted the services. Speaking on John Greenleaf Whittier and his poems. He had a large and representative audience, as he is a great favorite in the Connecticut Valley among people of all denominations. An Englishman by birth, a pastor of a country church, but so highly regarded by the people that he is constantly in demand outside the limits of his parish, and he has become a great power in progressive liberalism in western Massachusetts.

The ladies recently gave a "tea" and the gentlemen a "chowder party" to assist the society financially.

Mrs. Nora Dowd, for many years a prominent medium at Lake Pleasant, a sister of Mrs. Dillingham Storrs, of Hartford, Conn., entered spirit life May-day evening. The funeral at her request was conducted by Rev. R. F. Churchill and Francis Bailey Woodbury.

"In the World Celestial." A Spiritual Romance. By Dr. T. A. Bland. Price $1.00.

A Letter From Mrs. R. S. Lillie.

Will you kindly permit me to say to whom it may concern, that my present address is 358 West Roble St., St., Paul, Minn. I will answer calls to lecture, or attend funerals during my stay here; which will be until about the middle of June.

I left California, May 4. Mr. J. S. Maxwell, president of the Minnesota State Spiritualists' Association and Mr. J. P. Whitwell of St. Paul, had arranged for a course of lectures in the state, beginning in Minneapolis, May 10, with the North Side Spiritualist Society, and on the 17th with the Band of Peace Society. The subject on this occasion was. "Death the Gateway of Life," and although a heavy rain was falling, a good audience greeted us, much to our surprise. Both of these societies, with their regular speakers and mediums, gave us a royal welcome. Large audiences are always appreciated, but still more is the spirit of love and good fellowship as manifested by our co-workers here.

Mr. H. P. Courtney is president of the North Side Society. Mrs. Courtney is one of the mediums and platform workers. Mrs. Paul Beuhler, another earnest worker, followed with tests. She is kept busy with private sittings. I met Mr. and Mrs. Courtney in Los Angeles.

Mrs. S. M. Lowell is the regular speaker for the Band of Peace Society, and is loved by all. There are two mediums associated with her, whose names I have lost. All are at work in the spirit of truth and sincerity.

My next two Sundays will be in St. Paul. Of this I will write later on.

We have had a successful season in Santa Barbara, and are greatly indebted to Mr. and Mrs. Aitkin for the same. Mrs. Aitkin has followed my lectures with answers to questions, by clairvoyant reading of ballots. I have had an opportunity constantly for close observation, and I consider her work to be of a superior order. In many instances it has been very clear and strikingly correct, often giving the exact words contained in the ballot, and frequently names, and valuable information entirely foreign to and outside of the ballot. She has served faithfully, never absent and without remuneration. She has a very attractive and pleasing personality, and makes many friends, and sends out the radiance of sunlight and happiness. She attributes her power to the Spirits, turning frequently to "Chief" to give her what she could not see clearly. Their home has been opened often through the winter, for social gatherings, which have been an important feature, and will be remembered long after our many duties call us in various directions, perhaps, from Sunny California. In these gatherings Mrs. Carey, Mrs. Aitkin's mother, was an important character, doing the things so necessary to the happiness of all, while Mrs. Aitkin gave readings and others contributed music, poems, etc.

To Mrs. Carey we are also indebted for the always beautifully decorated hall, with such an abundance of flowers as California alone can supply. To Mr. Aitkin for constant and faithful service in almost every way. He it was who arranged for the lecture course, and was its financial backer. There were kind and loving hearts who assisted him in this, and who were ever prompt in rendering good service, and to all we send loving and appreciative thoughts. Mr. Lillie conducted the music and made himself generally useful, and only those who know him best know what this means.

Mr. Lucius Colburn, well known in Spiritualism everywhere, especially in Vermont, now president of the First Society of Spiritualists of Santa Barbara, also of "The Vermont Society," stands among the first in loyalty of friendship, fidelity to Spiritualism, and generosity to all co-workers. Life's choicest blessings be with them all.

Last night! Well, "What of the night?" It wasn't such a night as Shakspeare describes, but it was a night long to be remembered. After a week of rain, this was a thunder storm all night, and such thunder and lightning as beggars description.

I didn't get up and run, for I didn't know where to go, but it made me wish I was back in the land of earthquakes.

No place, it seems, has a monopoly of flowers. In California we seldom see the lilac. It is sending its sweet breath in at my open window this morning. The lily of the valley grows with very little care here, and follows the frost and snow so quickly that it seems one of nature's beautiful emblems of Life and immortality.

The parks of St. Paul and Minneapolis are radiant with tulips, of every shade, and the fields so yellow with dandelions that they remind us of fields of California poppies. The robin a bird seldom seen there, and which stays but a short time at best, is singing his sweetest notes, as a part of the new-made earth, of the East and Northwest.

What would the Spiritualists do without The Progressive Thinker? I haven't seen a copy for three weeks and feel lost.

Yours truly and fraternally,
R. S. LILLIE.

LIFE.

With the bustle,
And the hustle,
Of a busy, active life,
With the worry,
And the flurry,
Makes it one of strife.

Pain and pleasure,
Without measure,
If we will or not;
Sick or well,
None can tell
What is in our lot.

Pleased or mad,
Gay or sad,
It is our nature too,
Forgive and forget
Lest we regret,
Harm that we might do.

Life goes on,
Pro and con,
Love will conquer sin.
Then we know,
With hearts aglow
The heaven that is within.

Germs of Mind in Plants

By R. H. France, Translated by A. M. Simons.—Cloth, Illustrated, 50 Cents.

A cardinal point in the philosophical systems favored by the ruling classes is that the mind of man is something unique in the universe, governed by laws of its own that have no particular connection with physical laws. Modern science has proved that not only animals, but also plants receive impressions from the outside world and use data thus obtained to modify their movements for their own advantage, exactly as human beings do. These facts are told in this book in so charming and entertaining a style that the reader is carried along and does not realize until later the revolutionary significance of the facts.

DIFFERENCE OF OPINION.

It would be a public misfortune if all the newspapers agreed about everything. There are two sides to every question. It would be a very great misfortune if they ceased to criticise one another when occasion demanded, for one of the duties of newspapers is to police one another in order that the sources of public opinion may not become polluted. But this healthful and honest criticism is a vastly different thing from the petty jealousies and war-to-the-knife enmities that so long retarded the highest development of the New York press.

The above from the New York World gives expression to an impressive truth. Uniformity in religion, uniformity in belief, uniformity in practise, all these are possible in this progressive age of the world.

It would be certainly a calamity if all Spiritualists agreed that everything that came from the spirit world had thereon the stamp of truth. The only way for Spiritualism to progress is through the great variety of opinions which are expressed on every side. From this great variety there will flow some absolute truth that the critical will be able to detect. It would be ruinous for all minds to run in the same groove. It would be worse than ruinous to suppose that all Spiritualists can think alike in reference to spirit return. It is through this agitation of thought that progress can be made, and the future prepared for the reception of a higher grade of thought.—Critic.

Mr. Charles Bailey

The Spirit Manifestations occurring in his presence at Melbourne, Australia, are creating great interest the world over. Several prominent Spiritualists of this city will at no distant day make an effort to secure his services in this country. Again, the following account of one of his seances will be read with unabated interest.

MR. T. W. STANFORD'S SEANCES WITH THE MEDIUM, CHARLES BAILEY.—BY MRS. CHARLES BRIGHT.

Since our last issue, the feature of the month has been the delivery of two addresses by Prof. W. K. Clifford, the first one, on "Atoms," being reproduced below. It will be seen that Professor Clifford proclaims the scientific basis of the passage of matter through matter as something that increasing knowledge will make the whole world cognizant of. It is simply an extension of natural laws controlling the Universe. In emphasizing the importance of people gaining a knowledge of these laws, rather than seeking "tests" from mere curiosity, Professor Clifford said: "I was not a Spiritualist in the flesh, though I was prepared to admit there were many marvellous happenings I knew nothing about; and since I have gone into the spirit world and had permission and power to come back to your earth plane again, I feel that it is our duty to enlighten, give knowledge to those who are seeking it, and that knowledge is far better than the mere bringing of apports for the sake of convincing a few people, or those who, perhaps, view it as a matter of curiosity. * * * But if any one of these investigators or mediums can give the world one grain of knowledge that will uplift humanity in any way, then will they continue, and God speed them. But if you desire the scientific world to take note of your doings, you must banish all that smacks of fortune telling, divination for gain; and every meeting held should be safeguarded from fraud." Those present at the meetings will not readily forget the earnest and incisive utterance of Professor Clifford. It was felt, moreover, that nothing in the shape of an ordinary "test" could equal that of a scientific address through the lips of an uneducated medium—brilliant with the latest discoveries concerning matter, and pointing to still higher results awaiting the earnest investigator.

Among the phenomena, the most striking was the growing of the plant photographed for the supplement to this issue, fuller mention of which is made elsewhere. The following is a brief account of addresses and phenomena since the March issue:

76th Seance, Jan. 24. Address by Signor Valetti entitled "Is God Revealing Himself Now?" Phenomena. Small spotted egg brought, which was placed in flower pot with spore to help grow a plant. Mahomet explained that as there are plants that eat meat so the influence of the egg on the plant would be stimulating. The plant grew on top of the egg several inches during the circle. Clay with mosaics. Two manuscripts from the centre of Thibet with Buddhist cosmogony and sacred doctrine.

77th Seance. Jan. 31. Address by Dr. Channing on "The Triumph of Truth." Phenomena. Small bird said to be the mate of one brought previously. Abdul catches two birds in the light, after giving Mr. Stanford his fan to hold. Clay with mosaics.

78th Seance. Feb. 7. Address by Professor Clifford on "The Scientific Aspect of Crystal Gazing." Phenomena. Clay with mosaics. Bunch of seaweed. Atmospheric conditions bad.

79th Seance. Feb. 14. Address by Professor W. K. Clifford on "Atoms," given below. Phenomena. After the medium had been searched and rolled on the floor a bird's nest as a special test was brought containing four small eggs. Abdul crushed one with his finger to show how brittle the shells are and that the least pressure would break them. Lump of clay with mosaics.

An Address Delivered by Professor W. K. Clifford, on Friday Evening, Feb. 14, 1908.

(Specially reported by Miss M. Wilson, shorthand writer and typist, Premier Buildings, Collins street, Melbourne.)

"I desire to speak to you to-night for a short time only upon 'Atoms.' The great majority of mankind are, as a rule, careless about the component parts of matter and the wonderful forces round about them, and do not seek to know anything. But the thoughtful man who desires to penetrate the secrets of nature will investigate every subject that is worthy of consideration. At the outset I will place before you two positions. First: Mind is superior to and controls matter. Kindly take note of this first proposition—'Mind is superior to and controls matter.' Secondly: Every particle of matter attracts other particles. Kindly note this also. Perhaps you desire a definition of matter. I do not think that I can give you a better one than the following: Everything that possesses the properties of gravity or attraction may be classed as matter. That is, I believe, the most scientific definition of what we call matter.

How Scientists Describe Matter.

Scientists living on the earth plane have told you that matter is composed of molecules, atoms, and electrons. These atoms are very small—about 100,000th part of an inch in size, and yet go to make up ponderous masses like the planet Jupiter. What are molecules? Small particles of matter in one of three conditions. Matter is either solid, liquid or gaseous. If solid, it is strongly cohesive; if liquid, less so; if gaseous, well, the atoms may be said to bump against each other and rebound. A molecule is made of several atoms. For instance, a molecule of water is composed of three atoms—two of hydrogen, and one of oxygen. What are atoms? Still smaller particles of matter, possessed of force so wonderful that it is utterly impossible to track down and examine atoms, for the reason that they are instantly changing and their passage through the atmosphere is so rapid. But your scientists, though unable to examine atoms like bacteria, know a great deal about them; but there is much that they do not know. For about 200 miles above your earth plane there is what is called an atmosphere; and about that distance it becomes very rare. What is the connection between this rarefied atmosphere and the sun? He shoots forth his rays of light, which ultimately reach the earth. The space through across what you call the solar system—though there are many other solar systems——is very great indeed; and it would take light a long period of time to traverse that distance, even traveling as it does, at about 180,000 miles per second. Think, then, how vast is the universe, and that around every star, every sun—and there are millions of suns beyond your vision and the scope of the most powerful telescope that ever will be invented—there exists something which is called ether, with vibrating, undulating motion, come the waves of light which are ultimately shed abroad upon your earth plane, which give light and life to every plant and beast and man. And the countless atoms that I have been speaking of are in constant motion, passing through the ether with wave-like undulatory motion. Let me tell you something that may surprise you. Atoms, like human beings, have their likes and dislikes. Here is an atom and there is another; they are drawn together, or there is no affinity, and they are attracted, quicker than thought, somwhere else; then, having found their affinity, there is cohesion.

How Professor Clifford Has Gained Knowledge in the Spheres.

Since the year 1879 I have entered with spirit life into a new school. Previous to that I was, for a short period, Professor of Mathematics and Mechanics at a university college, and I now realize, though receiving honor from those who placed me in this position, that I had but little knowledge. When I reflect how little I knew then, and how much more I know now, I am exceedingly grateful, and remember that I have acquired that knowledge because I have in a sense become one with the unseen. Those persons who are surprised at the passage of matter through matter, who regard it as a wonder, are, from our standpoint, in the position of those dark-skinned races who, when a traveler visits their shores, approach him with suspicion, and if he obtains a light from a match in his pocket, their souls are filled with wonder. Fire is obtained with a touch, while these savages have to laboriously rub two sticks, or a stick and a stone together. The traveler, however, does not think the match wonderful, but smiles at the savage's simplicity. And we smile sometimes—if you will permit me to say so—at the simplicity of people in the flesh who declare that the passage of matter through matter is impossible. Oh, my friends, you are quite unacquainted with the properties of matter, and you must wait until you get into the higher school before you will understand all its subtle forces. Then, if you desire to return and give this knowledge to your fellows, you may do so; but you will find, as I do, one great obstacle, and that is the inability to express your new found knowledge in the words that make up the English language. Remember now my second proposition, that every particle of matter attracts other particles. These atoms then have force and heat also—intense heat—heat that all the furnaces of your earth plane could not produce. Under certain conditions, however, there may be a loss of heat and if it were possible in the laboratories of the earth to expel heat entirely from the atoms composing matter, then it would become practically lifeless and inert. That is, however, impossible, and while they possess heat and force, these atoms, which may be solid, liquid, or gaseous, move through the ether, which not only joins with the atmosphere surrounding your planets, but connects with far distant worlds. And this ether, subtle air, is round about you. Nature, in her crucible and in her laboratory, performs many wonderful works. In the passage of matter through matter—and I suppose I am here to-night to explain that chiefly—the spirit of the man who becomes a chemist sets to work. But, mark you, as every spirit who passes into the earth plane is not a spiritual chemist, so everyone who passes into the spirit world from the earth plane would not be able to reduce matter to ether or gaseous substance and pass it through into this room, but only those who have the knowledge of spiritual chemistry, if I may use that word. Many of the Hindoos have this knowledge. They learned much while they dwelt in the flesh. In India—a land hoary with antiquity—they have studied Nature's secrets when our forefathers were crude, ignorant savages. Passing into spirit life and becoming en rapport with Nature, they delight to add to their knowledge. There are others, also spiritual men, belonging to Aryan tribes or races, who can effect the passage of matter through matter—who have become spiritual chemists, so to speak, or gained occult knowledge.

What Men Call God is the Controlling Power.

I said in my first proposition that mind is superior to matter. It is a superior mind, which you call God, that controls all matter. Now, I am going to make a statement which orthodox persons would regard as sheer blasphemy; but it is the truth, the very truth of God, and so I make it. We read in the book of Genesis—and I do not ask you for a moment to accept it as literal; it comes from the Babylonians, who were, after all, a very wise people—that, "The Spirit of God," after the creation, "moved upon the face of the waters." If you get right down to the bedrock of the Hebrew and the Greek, you will find that "Spirit" means "holy wind"—holy spirit is holy wind, the atmosphere that you breathe. Perhaps you catch the idea. But before I go into details, I must tell you that the atoms of which I have been speaking are also subdivided by scientists. They are called electrons, not that in reality these atoms are split up again, divided, and then these very small particles are called electrons, but that the atoms carry electrified points—that is the best I can put it in English, for you—they are electrified. In other words, electricity—not the electricity that you behold in the lightning's flash, nor electricity you have in the magnet and in the coils, because there are many kinds of electricity—but a subtle kind of electricity that has not yet been discovered, that has not been tracked down by the earth's scientists, claims them. These points of the atoms which are electrified are called electrons. Your mind cannot grasp how infinitesimal, how small, are these fine particles which some have called polarized particles. That is, what the scientist means, or should mean, when he speaks of electrons.

Now, grasp the resultant idea. We read in the Scripture of the spirit of God; we gather from certain passages that it permeates the universe: "Whither shall I go from Thy spirit?" said David, "or whither shall I flee from Thy presence?" "If I make my bed in hell, behold, Thou art there." If I take the wings of the morning, and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea; even there shall Thy hand lead me, and Thy right hand shall hold me." But the spirit of God which moved upon the face of the waters, this Spirit of God which enters into the hearts of men, the Comforter, which the Nazarene said should be with men—what is it—this wonderful electricity of which I have been speaking? There is no place, no part of the universe—and mark, some scientists say there are a number of universes, but it does not matter, for all which is infinite, eternal is comprised in that one word "the universe"—where this pervading spirit is not found. Permeating everywhere is the subtle power which we call the "Spirit of God." It is that subtle power that keeps the universe sweet and in order, that the worlds as they revolve in their orbits, one planet holding another, this cohesion causing rocks, trees, gases, liquids, man himself. But the subtle spirit of which I have been speaking is able under certain conditions to scatter it all—the giant rocks, the mighty trees, the planets, great Saturn and Jupiter—to change them all. Such is the Spirit of God—illimitable, eternal, vast, omnipotent? Can you grasp it? If you do, you have got a scientific basis for all phenomena. If you have got this scientific knowledge, you will grasp the right idea of God, of Christianity. But if you believe your God is like unto a man—an anthropomorphic being—your conception is no better than that of the Sandwich Islander.

Conclusion.

I have really gone over my time. I do not like long addresses; you forget the beginning by the time I have got to the end. But a few words in conclusion. In these wondrous atoms, with their likes and their dislikes, attracting other atoms through the ether, and in continual motion, we have force and motion and electrified heat; don't forget that. The spirit chemist knows how to use something that is akin to this subtle electric power which I have called the Spirit of God, and it is so powerful that he is able to reduce the atoms that are solid to a gaseous state. Nature does it. Remember, I said that oxygen under a low temperature and pressure can be transformed to a solid. It can also be reduced to a liquid, and into ether. The rocks, then, under such treatment become gaseous and etheric. Why, then, should not a stone pass through a stone? Is there any reason why? Can you scientists declare conscientiously that it is impossible? Every scientist knows that it is possible; he does not say it is impossible. He simply says, "I do not know what is possible." It is the ignorant, the unthinking man who says it is impossible? Yes, it is the man who is cribbed, cabined, and confined, as I told you last week, in a body having only five gateways of knowledge, who, unless he be endowed with a spiritual gift, denies the possibility of these things. These are scientific truths, and in the years to come scientific men will not declare the phenomena of Spiritualism to be absurd and impossible. It is because that at present they have not succeeded in getting much convincing evidence. It is because spiritual investigation has been left in the hands of people so grossly ignorant, that it is a wonder that intelligent people have had anything to do with it. It is because those on the intelligent plane—I am speaking of men in the flesh—have looked at the groping of Spiritualists, their surmises and their frauds, that they have held in utter contempt all the phenomena that have been received. But it is now being lifted onto a higher plane, placed upon a scientific basis—and the thoughtful, intelligent, and the scientific will delight to investigate the claims of Spiritualism. "Help on this grand work. It is the acquisition of knowledge which makes men free. And when you realize how wonderful, how marvellous, how infinite and eternal, is everything round about you in the unseen, then will you also realize that you are not a child of the devil; then will you understand that you have a place in the grand scheme of Nature. Not one of those minute particles or atoms can be spared out of the universe. Otherwise an atom would cry out, looking for its affinity; and as Isis was said to wander upon the banks of the Nile, looking for the dead Osiris, so would that affinity be wandering looking for its mate. But this cannot be. A single atom cannot be lost; neither can you be lost or spared out of the universe. You have a place, a power, and a part to fill; and all the theologians and priests that have declared that man is cursed of God have given the lie to every fact which Nature presents. The world of matter is a world of change—molecules changing, atoms changing—always in existence, and ever changing; but that subtle spirit which permeates them all never changes. Of that spirit you each possess a spark, a drop from the great ocean of infinity which can never die. It is immortal!—Harbinger of light, Melbourne, Australia.

A Worker's Suggestions.

Some of the Great Needs for the Advancement of the Cause of Spiritualism.

To the Editor: In the columns of your most worthy paper almost every week, we find articles from the pens of our most brilliant minds and best writers, advancing thoughts along different lines, of the best ways of advancing our noble Cause.

These articles inspire us on to a deeper, soul-striving effort, for to the earnest, honest worker in the field, and especially to those of us that are engaged in missionary work, either organizing societies or trying to build them up, this question is ever looming up before us.

Working in this, the great Southwest, as I have been for some time, when organization was scarcely known in the beginning of my work here, I have been observing very carefully.

After so much hard and strenuous work and close observation, I think that I can see some of the great needs for the advancement of the noblest of all causes.

First let us send forth through all the universe, with no uncertain sound, the one word, ORGANIZATION.

One very noticeable fact is that in every town or city we find many people calling themselves Spiritualists that will only come into the public meetings when some new attraction is announced.

Many of these people are well off in this world's goods, but will not give a cent to support organized effort.

We often find some of these people holding private meetings. In their midst is some one with some medial powers, but undeveloped. This opens a wide avenue for undeveloped spirits, obsessions, etc. No developing medium should give up to spirit control, losing their identity, without well understanding the power behind the throne.

These people selfishly go on in their non-progressive way, year after year, keeping what little light they have under a bushel, so that the greater light of their own souls can not unfold, for if we would receive, we must be willing to give.

If these good people would overcome their selfishness and come out with what light they have, and harmonize themselves with the great wheel of progress, how much help they could be to organized effort, and their spiritual vision would become so much clearer, their spiritual hearing would be more finely attuned to the spheres of the higher life, whence the angels of wisdom are ever ready to assist us by their words of love and strength.

In looking into the above conditions, and talking to these people that have come from everywhere, we find ourselves face to face with some of the difficulties causing these conditions. Many of these people have known and appreciated our old workers, have listened many times to the inspirations given through our noble, true and tried workers, that have now gone on to the world of souls.

From our point of view a few of these difficulties are as follows:

First. Made-up conventions. Care should be taken by the locals in sending delegates.

Delegates should know what they are in convention for, and at least be able to form an opinion of their own, what is best for the Cause, and not be controlled by some one or two minds that are underhandedly and selfishly working out some plan that suits them.

We talk loud and long of the old-time priestcraft ruling; what else is a convention ruled by such ruling as above stated?

We have been in conventions in different states, when dollar membership fees were very earnestly solicited in order to get votes in order to satisfy the selfish desire of some one, paying no attention whatever to the needs of the Cause, or whether the persons were capable of filling the office or not.

I believe that the officering of our State Associations should be as carefully looked after as that of our National.

That such persons should be selected as are capable of filling the different offices, and such persons as are able to further the progress of our great Cause by their mental adaptability to ways and means, and their spiritual understanding of the upbuilding of the higher Spiritualism.

If all delegates to conventions would go with a view only to the advancement of the Cause, and not to seek for something they are wholly unfitted for, or to satisfy some personal like or dislike, we would find much of the above mentioned trouble in organizing and building up obliterated.

We would also advise more care on the part of locals in selecting officers.

We must admit in local work the material needed is not always at hand; but be as judicious as possible, looking always to the good of the Cause rather than personal fame, personal likes, or dislikes.

In conjunction with the above, we need public speakers and preachers of personality, workers of mental qualification, that are at least able to speak the English language correctly; workers of high moral attainments; workers that are spiritually attuned to the higher vibrations of spiritual light and soul unfoldment.

We are fast approaching a great dividing line:

Upon one side the spiritual progressive; upon the other the material, phenomenal, non-progressive.

Must we as teachers and mediums, be drawn down and held in earth-bound conditions to cater to the rabble?

Oh, brother and sister Spiritualists, let us appeal to you in behalf of your mediums, your own soul self, and your loved ones that have gone on to the higher life, do not keep constantly trying to pull your mediums down into the earth.

As long as Spiritualists stay in the ruts of ignorance, only trying to use mediums as machines, through which to get the sensational, and grind material advice for worldly gain only, we may expect many difficulties in organized effort, and in promoting the Cause of Spiritualism.

This brings us to the question: What is the remedy?

We cannot blend together in harmony the forces on each side of this dividing line.

We must build from within, and teach more constructive Spiritualism.

If we would teach the way, and be a leading light, our lamp must be trimmed and burning.

Our soul consciousness must be wide awake to those high angelic spirits of wisdom.

The God (good) strength within us must be so unfolded that we can in moments of exalted spiritual states come in soul touch with the Eternal Goodness and drink deep draughts of spiritual strength from the great fountain head.

Then highly developed spirits of love and wisdom can so illuminate us, and strengthen us, that we will be fit receptacles to give and to receive.

The financial problem is another trying one, that none of our leaders have been able as yet to solve.

These conditions will in time surely but slowly be overcome.

But never until the exalted minds of the higher life can more fully demonstrate through the sensitives of earth, the real spiritual upliftment of mind and soul.

But there is a divine principle of life within each of us.

And as the sun comes forth in all its glory, kissing the earth in the early morn, so the Divine Principle within us must sometime, somewhere, come forth in a perfected love, overcoming all greed, selfishness, jealousy; and giving forth as the full blown rose, the aroma of a perfected life.

The wheel of progress, our noble Cause, must and will move on.

You and I have our share to do in moving this great wheel; let us be lifters, not leaners, and be strong, consecrating ourselves to the All Power Goodness, unfolding the highest and the best within us, looking daily in our hour of silence, to the great Master in the higher life for our instructions.

Then with true, unselfish and devoted love let us go forward in harmony, hand in hand, soul to soul, in this the greatest of all work—the spiritual upbuilding of the human family; and in organized effort for the religion of all religions, Modern Spiritualism.

REV. ALICE BAKER.

Muskogee, Okla.

First Spiritual Union, Norwich, Conn.

The closing month of our services has witnessed largely attended meetings, successful social affairs, and active co-operation in our society and its three auxiliaries, the Helping Hands, Progressive Lyceum and Union Dramatic Club.

On Sunday, May 24, we had with us Mr. Fred B. Niles, of Marlboro, Mass., who served us in conjunction with the writer. Mr. Niles gave addresses and messages, and left a splendid impression with our people. His lectures were far above the averages and notwithstanding the fact that messages were to follow, he held the individual attention of the large audiences at both sessions. As one of our most critical members declared, Mr. Niles is an orator." His message work was good and straight to the point. We are glad to have him with us.

During the other Sundays the writer served with lectures, morning and evening as usual.

The Helping Hands gave two suppers, which were financially successful and well attended, the second one, on May 21, being a strawberry festival which tested the capacity of our building.

The Lyceum has done excellent work; much interest being taken in the subjects under discussion, and is in a flourishing condition.

During the past season the Union Dramatic Club has presented three plays: "Down by the Sea," "Old Acre Folk" and "The Song of the Church Bells," the latter play having been written by a member of the club and presented on May 28 and 29 to audiences that filled the Academy. The club has turned in over $200 toward the support of the society during the year.

Altogether we have had an excellent season, and prosperity has been ours in all ways.

During the summer we hold no services, but shall open the new year next October under the most favorable conditions, and the writer, with gratitude for the success that has attended his ministrations with this society for the three years past, looks forwards to his fourth year as its resident speaker with courage, and assurance of warm friendships, sincere appreciation and hearty co-operation between every member of the Union and himself.

NEARER AND DEARER.

Nearer and dearer are the blessed dead
Than we are wont to think,
When with farewells and tears we bow the head
Beside the solemn brink.

Tell me, thou child of grief—canst thou not see
With clearer eyes than then?
Tell me if love—thy love—can ever be
A thing of earth again?

O eyes that God hath cleansed with sacred tears!
O hearts by sorrow tuned!
Ye see and love as never all those years
While ye with flesh communed.

And are they not then nearer, whom we see
With eyes no longer blind?
And is not love the sweeter, if it be
Of an immortal kind?

O, comforting, sweet thought—that though we stand
On death-divided shores,
Love still can stretch to us its angel hand,
And lay its heart on ours!

From Dream to Vision of Life

By Lilian Whiting, Author of "The World Beautiful," "The Spiritual Significance," "The Outlook Beautiful," etc.

This book finds its keynote in the question asked by the Archbishop of Canterbury—"The Life Beyond,—what it it? What is its bearing on these present working years?" To the discussion of this vital problem Miss Whiting brings the results of modern scientific research and that peculiar spiritual clairvoyance which has been remarked in "The Life Radiant" and some of her other books. It is written with a certain joyous vitality that communicates itself to the reader in a certain radiance and liberation of new energies. Price $1.00 net.

Lest It Be Forgotten.

It is a remarkable fact that in all those countries where Christianity dawned, and first had its being, the institution, after more than 1,900 years, is scarcely known. It is mostly kept alive by missionary effort. Mohammedanism is the prevailing religion throughout Palestine, and in Jerusalem itself, as in every city where was first located, in Bible language, "the seven churches of Asia."

And Rome, listen, ye Catholics, and Protestants, ye daughters of Catholicism, a Jew whom ye despised and crushed, is mayor of the "Eternal City," made such some time ago by a vote of the board of aldermen of 60 to 2.

In Constantinople, whose emperor by royal decree, it is claimed, gave stability and character to Christianity, as in all the localities in its early history where it is alleged councils were held, as Nicaea, Laodicea, Carthage, etc., an antagonistic religion prevails.

This information is repeated lest the reader forget the direction in which public opinion is drifting.

A Catholic priest declared awhile ago: "The Inquisition is necessary to make Christianity a stable institution;" and a Protestant clergyman said: "Heretics ought to be hanged;" and The Progressive Thinker is of the opinion both should be civilized.

Socrates a Spiritualist.

Can any one familiar with the life of Socrates arrive at any other conclusion than that he was a Spiritualist? His Demon with whom he conversed so freely, and gained such valuable knowledge, which the Athenians interpreted as another god, and for which he was compelled to drink the poisoned cup, was clearly the spirit of some ancient philosopher. That spirit became the guide, instructor and friend of the great scholar and teacher. His reply to an attendant at the closing scene, who inquired, "What disposition shall we make of you when dead?" To which Socrates replied: "Anything, you please, if you can catch me." And this 400 years before the Christian era. Says Lemprier:

"Socrates told his judges he was going to hold converse with the greatest heroes of antiquity; * * * and gave them his opinion in support of the immortality of the soul, and reprobated with acrimony the prevalent custom of suicide."

A Serious Blunder.

L. K. W., of The Truthseeker, says: "If God had gone around the earth and seen other tribes of men before he selected his chosen people, we would all be better off."

Perhaps a greater error was made by God in the selection of Moses, the murderer, as his mouth-piece.—Ex. 4:16. Trouble commenced when that fellow of phenomenal meekness came to the front. Every damnable act of infamy thereafter was heralded with, "Thus saith the Lord." A portion of all the spoils captured in taking cities, and of all the maidens saved from slaughter, became the property of the Lord. The Lord's share of maidens in one of the raids was thirty-two, and these were given to the priest, who probably shared them, and other plunder, with the deputy God, Moses. See chapter 31, of Numbers.

I would rather be a poor man in a garret with plenty of books than a king who did not love reading.—Macaulay.

A Wonderful Historical Find.

In a late number of the New York World was published a "Special Cablegram from Paris" of a recently discovered Greek parchment by Abbie Jaffre in Egypt, of a letter from Jesus Christ to King Abgar. Then the letter is published at length, and all the Christian world rejoices that the Good Master, who it was supposed could not write, left tracings other than in the sand, which no one ever read, with an account of his divine mission.

The letter commences::

"Blessed art thou, O Abgar, and blessed is thy city, called Edessa. Thou art blessed because that, without seeing, thou hast believed, and thy health shall be restored to thee forever. Touching my coming unto thee, I must accomplish the mission for which I have been sent hither, and after having fulfilled it I must return to my Father."

And thus on at considerable length. The great point was to express joy that the writer's divine mission was recognized without seeing, while bribery and force was needed to convince others. Now everybody and his wife should be convinced, and those pesky infidels should drop their disbelief, and own up frankly that they have been deceived.

Edessa, where was that? inquires an investigator. The site is now known as Oorfa, the Ur of the Chaldees, from whence came Abraham. It is now a Turkish city of some 30,000 inhabitants, without a Christian within its walls. Departed glory; for it seems there was one, near 2,000 years ago, when Abgar owned up to being a convert.

But, wonderful, isn't it? this RECENT discovery, and the great New York World paying an immense sum to have it cablegramed so as to get it in the hands of its Christian readers at an early hour! They need it to stay the receding tide.

Too bad this recent find did not come to light before.

But, hold! We are too fast. Eusebius, the first Ecclesiastical historian, who Christians want us to believe wrote and completed his production A. D. 324, relates this legend. See liber 1 chapter 13. It has been the common property of the world ever since the forger found such a letter was needed. In our Mosheim's Ecclesiastical History, after relating the legend, in a note on page 26, volume 1, we find the following:

"It is remarkable the story is not mentioned by any writer before Eusebius; that it is little noticed by succeeding authors; that the whole affair was unknown to the Christians, their contemporaries, as is manifest from the early disputes about the method of receiving Gentile converts into the church, which this story, had it been true, must have entirely decided. As to the letters, NO DOUBT CAN BE MADE OF THEIR SPURIOUSNESS, since if Christ had written a letter to Abgarus, it would have been a part of the sacred Scripture, and would have been placed at the head of all the books of the New Testament."

Mosheim wrote near 200 years ago. For more than 40 years this writer has been clipping, and placing in his Apocryphal New Testament these forgeries, "recently found in Egypt," of which this letter of Abgarus is one. There may be a score of them, and they are all "just found and very important," not clippings only, but the "recently found in Egypt letter" itself, in the very words of this cablegram, appears in Eusebius, and is copied into the Apocryphal New Testament, edition of 1890, pages 62, 63. We have wasted many a dollar in purchasing "fac simile editions of Greek manuscripts" which have been dug up in some old monastery, usually in Egypt, and every one of them, without a single exception, on examination critically, proved to be a forgery.

Our Long Island friend, who sent us this copy of the World, will accept our thanks for his kindness in the premises.

Transition of Prof. J. S. Loveland.

The transition of Prof. J. S. Loveland occurred at 1 o'clock in the morning of Thursday, May 28. He has long been well known and honored among Spiritualists. He was a very able and conscientious man, a strong thinker and clear and forcible writer and speaker, and has exercised a great influence in our ranks by his commanding ability and logical presentation of truth as it appeared to his strong mental perceptions. He was an early adherent of Spiritualism, and has never faltered or failed to stand true to his convictions. He has gone to his reward, and the love and best thought of thousands will go with him into his new and higher sphere of life.

Another Victim.

Rev. Geo. Clark, of Cambridge, Mass., formerly an Episcopal clergyman of Cincinnati, who expressed sympathy and held many views in common with Dr. Crapsey, of Rochester, lately expelled for heresy, was deposed from the ministry last week by Bishop Vincent. Rev. Clark is reported as a gentleman of great ability, and the probabilities are he will be heard from further on.

If all clergymen who, at heart, repudiate the teachings of Christianity, were retired from the ministry, "A Pulpit to Rent" could be displayed with propriety on many a church door.

Murder and Emotional Insanity.

"Fairmount, W. Va., May 18.—Following a series of revival meetings which he had been conducting in his church at Rossman, near here, Rev. C. S. Cossman, aged 50, one of the most prominent ministers in this section, cut his beautiful young wife's throat, causing instant death. The minister declares the act was committed while suffering from a fit of temporary insanity and that when he looked upon the lifeless body of his wife his reason immediately returned. The revival which closed last night had been unusually successful and many new memberships had been added to his church. While discussing the revival with his wife, Cossman snatched a knife from a table and rushed at her. Mrs. Cossman escaped into the yard, where she was overtaken by Cossman. Although the woman battled desperately for her life, the minister cut her throat from ear to ear. He then gave himself up to the police. Mrs. Cossman was aged 30 years, and a member of a prominent Fairmount family."

The above telegram appeared in the news colums of the Woman's National Daily a few days ago. Not a week, and scarcely a day passes without an account in the public press of some great crime by churchmen, frequently murder. And the revivalist seems as liable as any to these atrocious acts.

The plea of insanity is the usual defense, to which a jury of churchmen lend willing ears. Self-opinionated and dictatorial, assuming to voice the will of God, the preachers are unwilling to brook any opposition, and are violently angered at dissentients on the most trivial occasion—they become, in fact, what is popularly known as "crazy mad." It is a resemblance of the spoiled child, magnified by age. Such was clearly the case with the one in review. The loving wife likely took exception to some doing of her godly husband, and fell a victim of his brutal anger. The thoughtless wretch was aroused to consciousness when he saw the dear woman dead at his feet, then he sought to evade responsibility by reporting his crime to the authorities.

This plea of "emotional insanity" ought to be eliminated from the criminal code, and sensible juries are inclined to disregard it. The case of Thaw is in point. He claims to have been insane when he killed White, but was rational a minute after. Set free, what security is there that he will not commit a similar crime the moment he is liberated. The only safety, since he escaped the executioner's chair, is perpetual imprisonment. And so should be the treatment of every emotional murderer. The law furnishes a remedy for all offenses, and private attempts at punishment must be rebuked. There is another point in this connection that deserves attention: The state exempts churches from taxation under the specious claim that they are conducive to good morals. It is possible they are such to a limited extent. But our public schools under state control, away from creedal dictation, should be and are the best and most effective nurseries of virtue and morality.

The great revivals are but hypnotic performances. Subjects are entranced and left in that condition. The influence soon passes away with the major part, but the more impressible, the women and children, continue under control, and many of them develop into insanity. It is stated by investigators that the trail of the successful revivalist can be traced by the insane, the products of his skill in warping the mind of his victims, and making them subservient to his will.

A Priestly Stampede.

"Nineteen Protestant Episcopal Desertions to Rome" is a headline to a lengthy article in an exchange which enters into details. The Catholic News, of New York, says this number "have come into the Catholic church within the last few months or are on their way, and will be received, it is hoped, before the summer has made much of a stir in church circles."

That is as it should be. The Catholic church is the parent of the whole brood, and its higher officials know of its fraudulent beginning and are skilled in the art of concealment.

Had Luther and his associates been in possession of the facts to which scholars at this time have access, there would have been no Protestant churches, for they would have repudiated the entire fabrication. It is a deception, practised for a thousand years, protected from exposure by statutes against blasphemy and heresy, aided by dungeons, torture chambers, confiscation of estates, etc., which have made that great corporation what it is.

It seems probable large acquisitions will be made to Catholicism from Protestant churches during the next half century; while a new organization will spring into being, almost unanticipated, which will absorb, first the learned, afterwards the masses of Protestantism, their object, to embrace great truths rapidly coming to the front, and partly to protect themselves against the encroachment by the "Mother of Harlots" on free institutions.

The divided sects must bind themselves into one great protective organization; else fall victims to the usurper, directed by a single head, whose principal ambition is universal empire.

EXTRAORDINARY MANIFESTATIONS.

Mrs. Mary Frances Beetz is in Close Touch With the Spirit Realms.

To the Editor: In the last mail I received a letter from a dear brother away up here in Washington, who says he read my Spiritualistic experiences in The Progressive Thinker of Nov. 30, and then he asks me if I am a Spiritualist, and if so, what reasons I have for being a believer, and winds up by asking me what proof I have of immortality.

Were I to relate all the proof I have, it would consume more time than I have to spare. The most satisfactory spirit manifestations I have transpire after I have retired at night, and always something new. Last night the walls of my bedroom were banked high with flowers of every hue—all kinds, from the lowly pansy to the stately lilac, the most beautiful of these being crisp white and gorgeous purple, which diffused the sweetest perfume, while above and among these flowers scintillated beautiful blue stars, which I saw fall in a shower from a star-bedecked canopy. Then the room grew very dark, and I seemed to be swaying gently in space, and there ensued a blissful few minutes, during which I was independent of the physical body, and heard voices and music of the spirit spheres. When I had returned from this little visit I went to sleep and slept soundly till after midnight, when I awoke and heard girls talking, seemingly coming toward me, and one of them said: "Hello, Mrs. Beetz; we are coming to see you, Ida, Anna, and Nell." I was glad, for they were three of my best friends in my home town.

Although this Sunday has been damp and unusually cold for May, yet it has not influenced against spirit manifestations to any marked degree at my house. At my parents' home some years since we postponed seances if the weather was rainy or threatening, thinking that we would obtain little or no results, but judging by experiences since then, I think we had the wrong ideas; however, I believe that prolonged cloudy weather detracts from our magnetic force, inasmuch as the electric power from the sun is imbued by the animal body and converted into magnetism, making greater our power of attraction, or making wholly our attractive quality. I have noticed that sharp or sonorous peals of thunder, or vivid and extreme electric display during a storm will, for a time, disturb spirit manifestations; but I attribute this more to the overwrought condition of the sitters than to the inability of spirit visitors, for often the least mental or physical agitation will materially hinder that which we so earnestly seek.

I was expecting an early caller this morning, so, as usual, I was awakened by spirit rapping on the wall. While I was getting breakfast and tidying my house, unseen visitors were talking to me, or rather to one another and about me, which I did not pay much attention to until I heard them criticise me sharply for working indoors so much and exercising outdoors so little. Then I tried to remember what else they had said, but failing, I became clairaudient again, and clairvoyant, too, and it seemed quite naturaly to be working among a number of other people who talked a good deal, answering my mental questions, not especially intended for them, before I had really asked them. At times the conversation would reach my external or physical ears—a materialized voice, mind you, the result of a perfectly negative condition on my part, but space limits me.

Just before sitting down to write this I went into my library for some paper, and was greeted by a multitudinous "Good morning," which sounded like heavy sleeting against the wall paper, everywhere at once, intermingled with distinct knocks on the table, the floor, the wall, and even on the window glass. Partially materialized forms brushed past me, touched my face and smoothed my hair, and as I sit here by the stove and write, there are raps on the paper.

Now do not understand that spirits touch us as we touch each other, by the physical senses, for that is impossible, as physical matter does not survive the second birth. The soul's covering is electrical, and when it comes in rapport with our magnetic force or life it sends direct communication to our physical senses. But when we see, hear and feel, then suddenly arouse from what seemed to be a waking dream, that is direct communion, soul with soul.

I have a neighbor who grieves much of the time for her husband who passed out a year ago, but she has not the hope and comfort we Spiritualists have, and probably if I told her that every time I went to her house I saw her husband near her, and drew her attention to the spirit rapping on the wall, she would be more displeased than pleased, and yet sometimes I think she would like to hear the many good things I could tell her, if they were not personal.

Yesterday I heard an old Dutchman talking while I was busy sewing. He had talked incessantly for some time, a fact which I realized when he stopped, his last words being a quotation which interested me so that I was alert in an instant, hoping to hear the rest of it, but I did not hear the rest so I tried to repeat what I had heard, but not one word could I recollect. The rhythm remained, but the substance eluded me.

There is much I would like to say relative to this particular phase of mediumship—facts I have discovered, which will not admit of a single doubt. I am alone most of the time, so when I see lights, hear songs and listen to music or orations grander and more soul-inspiring than any mortal's puny efforts, I know I am not deceived as to the source from which they come.

Some days ago a lady called to see who was grieving for her little boy. The child had gone with little warning, as is so often the case with croup, and she knew not where to turn for consolation. While she sat and talked of the little fellow, her eyes full of tears, and a sob in her voice, I saw him come close to her, lean his elbow on her knee and look inquiringly into her face. But her tear-dimmed eyes did not see, nor her dull ears hear him when he said: "Sometimes mamma cries so much I can't come close to her." Then he was gone for a few moments and when he returned he brought her an armful of flowers, more beautiful than our little dark earth can produce, and beside them on her lap, he placed a pretty white kitten which was dressed with a gay pink ribbon about its neck. So we see children are children still, even though they have moved out of the little frail house which cumbers the soul so much. Then several other children came in, as merry as could be, talking about "mamma," and "flowers," and "pretty ponies," and "books," and other things that help so much to make children happy. A little girl who had on a new gown, asked me if I did not think it "very beautiful," and a little boy who says he went to heaven where he would have room to grow, passed among the group of children with a bouquet of crimson and white roses, and gave one to each child, then made a wreath of those remaining and placed it on my head.

Some people ask me, "When strangers in the spirit world pass by and speak, why don't you ask them their names, where they lived, and where their folks are," etc., etc. This is why: First, I am not interested in people's private affairs. Second, I am not hunting for tests, outside the proof of immortality, which I have when I see them and hear them. Third, it shows a lack of appreciation of their efforts to begin plying them with questions which do not concern me, just because they are pleased to give me kindly greeting. It is the custom at picnics, along country thoroughfares, and in small towns to greet those whom we meet. Who of us would be presuming enough to stop these friendly strangers and ask them their names, where they live, their parents' names, how many here, how many there, and the cause of their going? When spirits can come to us and manifest, they will find a way to tell us all they would have us know.

Before closing, let me say that some persons who are clairvoyant are surprised to see a spirit near them, sometimes when the mind is employed with thoughts not of a Spiritualistic tendency, and call it imagination, which is not true, for that which the imagination conjures up never surprises you, for such exists only in your own thoughts.

N. S. A. ITEMS.

There is Much to Encourage the Workers.

The Board of Trustees at their semi-annual meeting, found much to encourage them in the good work going on. The air is full of promise for the cause of Spiritualism.

The Children's Lyceum movement is gaining rapidly, and new Lyceums are constantly being organized. The N. S. A. Lyceum Lessons have been a potent factor in that direction. But the Lyceum Superintendent has by untiring effort promoted the greater interest we now find.

Hence, the N. S. A. Board of Trustees adopted the following expression of regard for her efforts:

"Resolved, By the Board of Trustees of the N. S. A. that special thanks and expressions of appreciation are due Mrs. Elizabeth Schauss for the faithful and efficient discharge of her duties as Lyceum Superintendent, and that it is the sense of this Board that the increased interest in Lyceum work is largely due her efforts."

The Board has cancelled the clause at end of Missionary Certificates, providing for their revocation without demanding a reason therefor. The Certificates will not carry any provision for revocation, and will be issued on honor, and yet no right is thus conveyed to forbid cancellation for cause.

The affairs for preparation of the next convention to be held in Indianapolis, Ind., are well under way. The promise is splendid for a great convention amidst most excellent conditions.

These are dull times for all, but please do not overlook the needs of our public cause. Help now or soon, in order that the N. S. A. may realize that whate'er may betide us, we shall each and all be loyal to truth and humanity.

INTERESTING EXPERIENCE.

Demonstrating That Telepathic Communication Exists Between Mortals.

To the Editor: I give herewith some of my experiences. Whenever my father was discouraged or in the belief of sickness (caused through discouragement) he would invariably wish for me. Then it was that my children and I would see him in our home, which was then in another town. In a few days we would get a letter telling us of his illness. Wherever we send our thought, our spirit or thought-form goes. New Thought and Divine Science explains much that helps Spiritualism.

Another time I wished to write to a friend whose address I had forgotten, so I wrote to one in another town who know her, and asked for her address. I was telling a friend about her, and said I wanted to get her address. My son remarked: "Mamma, a lady was in your room the other day and told you Mrs. C.'s address."

"No one here knows her, so I know no one could tell me."

He insisted that "the lady" did tell me. Knowing he is psychic I said no more, but told my friend present that my son had seen the lady to whom I had written for the address. In a day or two I received the address, so I know it was when she received my letter that she sent me a telepathic message. I failed to receive it, but my son did.

On one occasion we saw a friend's form who lived in a distant city, but we could not make out what she wanted. In a few days I received a letter from her, and she said: "Had I had the power to call Sarah to me, I would certainly have done so, as I was so sick a few nights ago, and wanted her." I wrote and told her of my seeing her. Sarah is my daughter who had stayed a vacation term with this widowed friend of mine.

Whenever any one of our family is to pass to spirit life there is a very, very loud "crack" or "pop" in the room. I understand how one spirit can rap to call our attention to them, but this noise is so very loud I do not understand the reason. When my mother (Sarah Rayner Clough) was to pass out, that night something seemed to drop from the ceiling into a pot of water on the stove. It splashed every bit of the water out, yet nothing could have dropped in the pot as the ceiling was clear. In the morning about 4 o'clock she passed to spirit life.

When my father was to pass out, the loud noise came from the corner of the room. In the morning my mother came with a great white light before her, and went into my sister's room and awoke her. In a short time she carried away my father, John Clough.

A year later my adopted baby was passing out, and a friend and I were sitting in another room, and it sounded as if one of the heavy beveled mirrors had cracked. My friend (Clara Newman Murray, 2001 San Antonio street, Austin, Texas) never heard the like before. I knew what it meant.

I am a healer, and whenever my pupils are freed from their so-called ailments, some appear in a white light, while others will appear strong and well; then again I receive a psychic telegram or a postal, on which are the words written, telling me of their recovery.

I know that when all understand God as the spirit of life, intelligence, power, wisdom, love, encouragement, hope, faith and health, and that he is the vine, and we are the branches, they will see themselves as God's children, divine, for he cannot make anything not divine. They will know we constitute one great family, one great telepathic system, the glimpse of which Morse recognized, but Bell saw clearer, and Marconi still clearer, and scientists see perfectly.

FOREBODING REVEALS A DEATH.

Mrs. Margaret La Mont, Unable to Sleep, Finds Body of J. D. Lawrence in Adjoining Flat.

A presentment that something was wrong in the apartment occupied by Mrs. Rose Fauley, 3801 Cottage Grove avenue, Chicago, led Mrs. Margaret La Mont, who resides in the flat above, to discover the body of J. D. Lawrence, who had committed suicide.

"Is there anything the matter?" asked Mrs. La Mont, as she appeared at Mrs. Fauley's door. Mrs. Fauley said that there was not.

"I just woke from a nap, and somehow I had a feeling that there was some trouble down here," said Mrs. La Mont.

Then both the women started to look through the flat. Lawrence's body was discovered with a revolver near by. He had shot himself in the mouth. Mrs. Fauley did not hear the report of the pistol. Lawrence had been a roomer in her home for several years. She said that he had been despondent recently.

Some guardian spirit aroused the presentment, no doubt.

The Law of Opposites.

To the Editor: I wish a little space to demonstrate to the readers of your progressive paper, and also to crack a little joke on our pious and worthy opponents, the ministers, that his satanic majesty, "Nick," is the greatest of philosophers, and not such a bad boy as they wish us to think he is. Now, for instance, in the garden of Eden, when he tempted Eve to eat of the forbidden fruit, he said, "Ye shall be as gods knowing good and evil." Now here in these few words, knowing "good and evil," is what I wish to talk about, for in it is the expression of one of the great laws, and that is the law of opposites, which is the fundamental principle of expression of life and being, and also all intelligence, for without this law there could be no existence, no expression at all. As Emerson says, "There is an inevitable dualism that bisects nature so that each thing is only a half and suggests the other, its opposite, to express the whole, as in, out; up and down; light, dark; sweet, bitter; the positive has its negative; the male and female; and so it goes on through all expressions, things, and ideas."

We can see by that law that all intelligence and knowledge is only the knowing of some of these laws, by every day experience and fact of things; therefore, if Adam and Eve were not cognizant of some of these laws, can you just imagine what kind of creatures would they be? For it seems to me that the lowest form of life is cognizant of some of them.

All great philosophers and thinkers must know cause and effect, and according to their knowledge of same are they only wise, so our pious ministers can see it in this way, that it is only by experience and knowledge of things do we grow in wisdom, not by subjective faith, but by objective expression of deeds; and only through expression do we go higher; life is like a stairway, the lowest step must be to give expression to the highest, evolution and then involution, and so it goes on in eternity.

No one can imagine a place of eternal bliss, for evolution would not be, since evolution teaches us there must be a continual change, from the crude to the finished, from the lowest plans of animal life to the highest plans of the spiritual, is progression and expression of life, one-half must be to give expression to the other. As regards that myth about the devil, why he is only born of ignorance and superstition.

UNIVERSAL INTERACTION.

Wherever men are gathered, all the air
Is charged with human feeling, human thought;
Each shout and cry, and laugh, each curse and prayer
Are into its vibrations surely wrought;
Unspoken passion, wordless meditation,
Are breathed into it with our respiration;
It is with our life fraught, and over-fraught.

So that no man there breathes earth's simple breath,
As if alone on mountain or wide seas;
But nourishes warm life or hastens death
With joys and sorrows, health and foul disease,
Wisdom and folly, good and evil laborers
Incessant of his multitudinous neighbors;
He in his turn affecting all of these.

NATURE IS DIVINE.

As I sat gazing from my window, one bright sunny morn,
Upon the op'ning blossoms, with their prophecy in view,
I caught the fragrant perfume, on the gentle breezes borne
And saw the tiny leaflets, just unfolding to the dew.
I felt a deeper reverence, for the power of Nature's shrine,
And realized as ne'er before, that
Nature is Divine.

And then I thought of souls of men,
how they, too, did unfold,
And strive for higher wisdom, in the coming time to gain,
How through the dust of ages, our past history hath told
Of those who spurned not sacrifice, that justice might obtain;
That sought for hallowed equity, in cosmos' sacred mine,
And taught to men the valued
truth, that Nature is Divine.

I then an invocation sent, that righteousness and right,
Might ever in my heart be found,
most loyally and true,
That not a thought or act of mine,
should ever fear the light;
Would fill my mission in the world,
with sanctity in view,
May all who wish to think aright, to to this great thought incline,
And all the world embrace the truth, that Nature is Divine.

An Important Case.

The following in connection with the trial of Mrs. Elizabeth Hall, a prominent medium of Albany, New York, will be read with deep interest by Spiritualists generally.

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK
VS. ELIZABETH HALL

Brief on Behalf of Defendant, Stern & Hirschfeld, Attorneys for Defendant, 37 Maiden Lane, Albany, N. Y.

Statement.

The defendant is before the court charged with being a disorderly person in having heretofore and on Dec. 31, 1907, violated Subdivision 3 of Section 899 of the Code of Criminal Procedure of the State of New York.

The complainant is one Leora E. Reynolds, a police matron in the employ and service of the city of Albany. The said complainant in her information swears that defendant violated the said provision of law in that said defendant on Dec. 31, 1907, at premises 149 Clinton avenue, did "pretend to tell deponent's fortune in that she did take in her hand the left hand of deponent and after looking at same did pretend to tell deponent events which had transpired in her life and things which were to take place in the future, that for so doing she did charge deponent the sum of fifty cents."

A trial was had in the proceedings before the learned court on Jan. 9, 1908, when Leora R. Reynolds was sworn as a witness for the People and the defendant, Elizabeth Hall, was sworn as a witness in her own behalf.

The following is the provision of the Code which it is claimed the defendant violated:

Section 899. Who are disorderly persons. The following are disorderly persons:

* * * * * * * * * * * *

3. PERSONS PRETENDING TO TELL FORTUNES, or where lost or stolen goods may be found.

Point One.

THE MOTION MADE AT THE CLOSE OF THE PEOPLE'S CASE TO DISMISS THE PROCEEDINGS ON THE GROUND THAT THE EVIDENCE FAILED TO SHOW THAT WHAT THE DEFENDANT TOLD COMPLAINANT AS TO PAST, PRESENT AND FUTURE EVENTS IN HER LIFE WAS UNTRUE OR FALSE, SHOULD BE GRANTED.

Before the learned Court considers the evidence of the defendant it will be necessary to decide the motion made by the defendant at the close of the People's case, decision on which was reserved. We earnestly and respectfully insist that before a conviction can be had under the provision of the Code in question, it is absolutely necessary and essential that the People should prove that the person complained of, related or predicted events which were false or untrue. In other words we claim that it is not a crime to tell fortunes in this state, but that it is the PRETENDING to tell fortunes that would constitute a violation of law. It therefore becomes necessary for us to consider and determine the meaning of the word "pretending" as used in the provision of the Code.

Webster's Encyclopedaic Dictionary defines the word "pretending" as follows: "Holding out a false appearance, laying claim to or attempting to make others believe one is what in truth he is not, or that he has or does something which he has or does not, making hypocritical professions."

In words and phrases, Vol. 6, page 5542, the word "pretend" is defined as follows: "The common and generally accepted meaning of the word 'pretend' is to hold out as true that which is false, to feign, to simulate (citing Brown vs. Perez, 25 S. W. Rep. (Texas) 980-983.)

In the case cited, Brown vs. Perez, among other things a question arose in reference to an instruction by the court in which the following language was used: "Pretending to have been executed by Jose De Jesus Perez." The appellate court said in construing the meaning of the word "pretending:"

Whatever definitions counsel may find in the lexicons of the verb 'pretend' the common and generally accepted meaning of the verb is to hold out as true that which is false, to feign, to simulate."

Some dictionaries may give other meaning to the words "pretend" and "pretending," but the definitions above quoted are the generally accepted and popular ones and received the sanction and approval of the Texas court in the Perez case (supra) which is the only case we have been able to find in which the words are legally defined.

It has been held that the words of a statute shall be taken in their natural, plain, obvious and ordinary signification and where words have two significations the popular one should have the preference. (People ex rel. Eakins vs. Roosevelt, 14 Misc. 531.)

Our conclusion is that the Legislature in enacting the provision of law in question, intended that it should apply only against persons who claimed to have the power to tell fortunes when in truth and in fact they had no such power. In the case at bar there is not only a lack of proof that the defendant held out false appearance or that she did not make good her claim that she was a clairvoyant, but on the contrary it appears that all the information given to complainant as to the past and present was absolutely true and so far as the future is concerned time alone will reveal the truth or falsity of the defendant's predictions in that regard.

If we read the last half of Subdivision 3 of Section 899 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, "or where lost or stolen goods may be found," we can readily understand the intention of the legislature in enacting the law in yuestion.

Clearly that body never intended that this provision should be construed so as to prevent persons from telling where lost or stolen goods may be found, which is most desirable and valuable information, but it was the "pretending" to tell where lost or stolen goods may found, against which the provision was directed. It was the fraudulent act that the legislature had in mind and not the act truly and conscientiously done.

It is unnecessary to cite any authorities to the court that statutes of a penal nature must be strictly construed in favor of the defendant, and construing the statute in question before the court in that manner it seems to us that the learned court can reach no other conclusion but that our motion was a proper one and should be granted.

We wish further to add that the burden of establishing that the defendant held out false appearances is upon the People, for in every criminal proceeding the burden of proving every constituent of the offense beyond a reasonable doubt is upon the People and this principle is so well established that it would almost be an insult to the learning of the Court to cite or quote any authorities.

Point Two.

ASSUMING THAT THE COURT SHOULD DENY THE MOTION TO DISMISS THE PROCEEDING, THEN IT IS INSISTED THAT UPON THE WHOLE CASE AND ALL THE EVIDENCE SUBMITTED, THE DEFENDANT SHOULD BE ACQUITTED FOR THE REASON THAT THE ACTS COMPLAINED OF WERE DONE IN THE EXERCISE OF RELIGIOUS PROFESSION, AND WERE NOT ACTS OF LICENTIOUSNESS, NOR WERE THEY INCONSISTENT WITH THE PEACE AND SAFETY OF THE STATE.

The defendant did not deny that she had related and described to the complainant certain events or conditions which had happened or existed or would happen and exist in the future. She, however, clearly and unequivocally denied that she was or is a fortune teller in the general and popular acceptation of that term, and she also denied that she is a person pretending to tell fortunes, or that she ever held herself out to the public as such. Practically all the evidence given by the defendant has not been controverted.

Her testimony shows that she is a widow and has resided in the city of Albany for about six years last past; that she is a housekeeper and that her granddaughter resides with her; that the household is supported from the income derived by letting furnished rooms, and by money contributed by the granddaughter, which she receives for singing in several churches in this city. It also appears that the defendant owns the dwelling in which she resides.

The defendant claims that her religion is that of Spiritualism, and she clearly, intelligently and in a conscientious manner explained to the Court the doctrines of her belief and religious profession. Among the doctrines of her religion is the belief that when the spirit departs from our material bodies on death, it enters into a state of progression, and that the spirit is then able to and does communicate with the living, appearing in the material form or by flashing impressions on the mind of the living persons. She insists that she has the power of communicating with these spirits and that she does communicate with them in the exercise of her religious profession. Defendant also swears that she has seen spirits. She testifies that on the occasion that Mrs. Reynolds, the complainant, called at her home, defendant related the things complained of while exercising her religious profession, and that whatever information was given to complainant was through advice or communications received from the spirits of departed persons.

A serious and probably very important question is therefore presented to the Court as to whether or not the defendant has the legal right to practice or exercise her religious profession in the manner that she does.

The constitution of the state of New York contains the following provision: "Section 3, Article 1. The free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship without discrimination or preference shall forever be allowed in this state to all mankind; and no person shall be rendered incompetent to be a witness on account of his opinions on matters of religious belief; but the liberty of conscience hereby secured shall not be construed as to excuse acts of licentiousness, or justify practices inconsistent with the peace and safety of the state."

One of the great privileges of our American citizenship is the guarantee of our constitutions that every person has the right to exercise his religious belief according to the dictates of his own conscience. Almost from the discovery of America people from every other country have sought our shores as a haven or asylum from religious oppression and persecution and one of the most remarkable features of our life in this free land is, that amid our cosmopolitan citizenship, including men of practically every form of religious creed and belief, that rarely or seldom does any disorder or turmoil arise by reason of the diversity of religious opinions and men and women go on quietly with their life work respecting their neighbors even though they be of contrary religious opinion.

Of course it must be conceded that all practices of religious profession could not be permitted because the peace and safety of the state might be harmfully affected.

The Court of Appeals of this state very properly held in the case of People vs. Pierson, 176 N. Y., 201, in which the defendant was charged with omitting to furnish medical attendance to a minor child who was seriously ill, and as a result died, that the religious belief of the defendant, that of Christian Science, was not a defense to the prosecution for the violation of the code for reason that the failure to furnish medical attendance endangered the health and life of the minor, in which matter the state had a peculiar interest, and therefore decided that the guarantee contained in the constitution did not justify the omission to furnish the necessary medical attendance.

We can also easily understand that a person should not be permitted under the guise of religious belief to practice polygamy, and still be protected from our statute in reference to the crime of bigamy.

We do not contend that Subdivision 3 of Section 899 of the Code of Criminal Procedure is necessarily unconstitutional, as it is within the police power of the state to prevent fraud and deception, but that provision of the code we earnestly insist should not be construed so as to deny to this defendant the right to practice her religious profession in the manner that she did in this case.

There is nothing that the defendant told Mrs. Reynolds that in any way could be considered licentious or that would affect the peace and safety of the state. If it shall be held that what she practices does affect the peace and safety of the state, then what shall be said of the ministers of religion who constantly predict our future, and who from their respective pulpits describe to us things and conditions that will happen or exist in the hereafter. We claim that the defendant did no more than any minister would do and that they are protected from prosecution because they act from religious impulses.

It must be borne in mind that the defendant denies that she tells fortunes. She claims and asserts that she is merely a medium for transmitting spiritual advice, and she contends that authority for her religious profession and belief may be found in the Holy Bible.

The defendant has furnished counsel with the following Biblical quotations to bear out the contention that her religion is sanctioned by the Holy Bible:

"For he that is now called a prophet was aforetime called a seer." I Sam. ix:9.)

"When Israel went to inquire of God they went to the seer." (1 Sam. ix:9.)

"Saul called upon Samuel, the seer for advice about his father's asses, and paid him with a present of silver. (1 Sam. 11:8.)

"And thou shalt prophesy with them and shalt be turned unto another man. (1 Sam. x:6.)

"And it came to pass when the spirit rested upon them they prophesied. (Num. xl:25.)

"The Lord will make himself known in a vision to the prophets." (Num. xii:6.)

"Elisha, the prophet, telleth the King of Israel what thou sayest in thy bedchamber. (II King vl:12.)

"Daughters of Israel prophesied." (Ezek. xiii:10.)

"They went to Huldah, the prophetess, and the Lord spoke through her. (II King xxii:14; also II Chron. xxiv:22.)

"Deborah was a prophetess." (Judges iv:4.)

"Quench not the spirit, despise not prophecy." (I Thes. v:20.)

"But it is not ye that speak, but the spirit (Matt. x:20) and fell into a trance." (Acts xxii:18.)

"Anna, a prophetess." (Luke xi:36.)

"Philip, the evangelist, had four virgin daughters who did prophesy." (Acts xiii:8.)

If the learned Court should hold that the evidence before it is sufficient to convict the defendant as a disorderly person, it would be dangerous for any person to make any predictions whatsoever as to the future for fear of being arrested for a violation of the provision of the Code of Criminal Procedure in question. The legislature had in mind, no doubt, when it enacted that provision of the Code, that it should only apply to frauds and cheats and persons who claimed the power to foretell the future when in fact their professions were merely made for the purpose of extorting money from the innocent and unwary, but we contend that the statute was never intended to apply to a case like the one at bar, where a woman in the honest and conscientious exercise of her religious profession gave advice and information to another.

It is true the evidence shows that the defendant did charge Mrs. Reynolds a fee for her services, but this fact is absolutely immaterial to the issue, as the time she gave to Mrs. Reynolds was certainly of some value. Of course if it had been proven on the trial that the defendant was a fraud, and that she did the acts complained of merely to procure the money of the complainant, a different situation would have presented itself to the court, and the fact that the defendant did take money under such circumstances would be quite material.

Finally we wish to call the attention of the Court to the fact that thousands of people in this great country are of the same religious belief and opinion as the defendant, and while all of them do not claim to be mediums or profess to have the power to commune with departed souls, still they all believe that it is possible so to do and that there are some persons who possess the power to transmit the messages of the spirits of another world.

Even in our own community there are hundreds of high minded people, cultured and learned, who are sincere believers in the doctrines and teachings of Spiritualism, and naturally they are keenly interested in the final determination of the case at bar. The question submitted is not whether these people are deluded or mistaken, but rather what legal rights have they in the premises.

Counsel have been unable to find any case in this state where Subdivision 3 of Section 8999 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, has ever been judicially passed upon.

We therefore pray that the Court may give the case the due attention and consideration it deserves.

UNDER THE BAN.

Spiritualism and the "Holy" Catholic Church.

The decree of the Holy Mother Church [as set forth in Light, London] has gone forth, and henceforwardward Spiritualism is numbered amongst heinous offenses against her dignity. Spiritualists have little cause for complaint, for hostile recognition is generally the first victory of any moral, social, or religious reform, and no better proof of the steady progress of the truth which they love so dearly could be forthcoming than that their cause should meet with the severest displeasure of the Holy See. As regards their own state of salvation, the minds of Spiritualists are at blissful rest. If Rome is to be believed, the vast majority of them are already irretrievably lost, and like the reprobate, when he was warned that he was going to the devil, the Spiritualist prefers to join the excellent company entertained by his Satanic Majesty in his own way and at his own will.

But it is interesting to inquire into the why and wherefore of Rome's displeasure. Taken at their face value, the recent utterances of the Rev. Fathers Millar and Vaughan bear a close resemblance to ignorance of the subject of their condemnation, but in matters relating to Rome the face value is the last thing that should be considered. It is true that we hear a great deal of devils and evil spirits from the Romish pulpit, and the Spiritualist may well be forgiven the smile of toleration, or even the indignation, with which he greets each inspired utterance. But if he thinks that the warnings offered from pulpit and platform are the outcome of ignorance he is mistaken, and if he will bear in mind the policy pursued by the Vatican for centuries past and will bring his own knowledge of Spiritualism to bear on the subject, he will see why: for the probabilities are that Fathers Millar and Vaughan know as much about Spiritualism as he does.

If the Church of Rome regarded Spiritualism only in the light of a possibly dangerous religious movement she would scarcely have aided that movement by a declaration of her belief in spirit communion; she would more probably have allied herself with Science and declared that Spiritualism is nothing better than a fraud, conscious or otherwise, practised by mediums on unsuspecting persons. But she is driven to take the line of defense which she has adopted because she knows that Spiritualism is an actual fact, which Science can never hope to disprove, and that sooner or later the possibility of communion with the so-called dead must be generally recognized.

In the whole course of monastic history it is not to be supposed that psychic phenomena were unknown; on the contrary, the conditions prevailing in monastic life were ideal for the occurrence of manifestations. All that was needed was the student's mind capable of carrying out investigations and the truth would stand revealed, saturated it may be with the standard religion of the age, but undeniable testimony of life after death.

As a matter of fact, occult practices were not unknown to the fraternity of priests, but it was no part of their policy, nor is it now, to share their knowledge with the laity. As long as Rome retained her mighty influence all was well, but with the passing of the years and the advent of an immense struggle for religious independence she found herself mistress of a knowledge which she dared not use, either as a weapon of offense or defense, and which it behoved her more than ever to conceal, for she knew, only too well, the conditions which prevail in the Land Beyond, and realized that others might be led by intelligences which she could not control.

Now that Spiritualism has broken through the narrow confines of the monastery wall, at a time, too, when the influence of Rome is low and the masses are striking out for religious freedom with renewed vigor, Rome finds herself threatened with an ever-growing danger. The slave is a slave no more; the truth which she so long concealed for her own ends has at last broken its bonds and threatens the very foundations upon which her empire is built. For who can resist the compelling power of the spirit? Is it a matter for wonder, then, that Rome calls Spiritualism the work of the devil?"

J. H. C.

In his desire to accomplish the impossible by impeaching knowledge higher than his own in his recent sermons against Spiritualism, Father Bernard Vaughan seems to have been unacquainted with the so-called "apocryphal" gospel of the Hebrews, which contains minute and specific directions for the formation and conduct of what he so contemptuously alluded to as "spirit circles and seances. This gospel throws such a flood of light upon the nature and character of primitive Christian faith, methods, and psychic procedure, that one no longer wonders that it was speedily shelved, with other equally inconvenient Scriptures, to allow the very early heresies to be established, and to permit the grafting of pagan feasts, observances, and ritual. Is not the Church based entirely upon spiritual forces and activities?—if not, what is her raison d'etre? Who, or what, are the "Guardian Angels" to whom every Catholic child is taught to pray?—if not spirits—what? Father Vaughan declares that Spiritualism "demoniacal" or "diabolic," but he should recollect how it was charged against the very One upon whose life, words, and work his very Church is supposed to be founded, that "he cast out devils by the power of Beelzebub." While the Church seeks to compel her priests and laity alike to see only what is visible from her standpoint, and forbids both to seek any other or better basis for belief, the layman, having discovered a standpoint from hich to view one of the many facets of truth, fears not to avow the fact, and there are many thousands who not only know of spiritual forces and activities, but understand and use them to a greater or less degree. The illuminated Spiritualists who have lofty ideals, who ask and pray humbly for wisdom, not only receive present help and consolation, but frequently leave valuable contributions when they enter the world of spirit—nor do their activities then cease. Such are the saints—the spiritual entities of whom Father Vaughan is proud to know nothing!

Some five or six years ago I had the honor of placing before the readers of Light a precis of a portion of the Gospel of the Hebrews, to which I have already alluded, and I recommend it, and, by the way, all other so-called "apocryphal" gospels, to all earnest students of esoteric Spiritualism. Much in these old gospels (some of which are as authentic as those the Church has patronized, if not more so) is so inconveniently true that the fact of their existence has been suppressed in as far as the Church could accomplish it, and they are known only to such as seek. In the primitive Christian Church Father Vaughan could not have been accepted as a priest, for the qualification for the sacred office was the known possession of those very psychic gifts and faculties which he has done his best to minimize or decry. Those gifts alone could have entitled him to presume to teach or to initiate others. Without them he and all other pseudo-priests, even the popes, white and black, are but "blind leaders of the blind."

Spiritualism does not end in table turning and rapping, or in materializations; these phenomena constitute but the infant food prepared for babes in the wisdom.

GUSTAVE FLAUBERT,
Per Bianca Unorna.

A RETIRED VETERAN.

At the Age of Eighty-four He is Strong and Vigorous.

To the Editor: Although a retired old veteran of the Spiritualist Progressive Army, I am still in good health, in mind and body. I have all the time I wish for, to read and keep track of what is ever going on in the world as it rolls on in endless time. Occasionally I feel like breaking the silence with a sound from the past, in the form of a cry:

"Turn backward, turn backward,
O time in its flight;
And let me be young again
If only for to-night."

The sun, moon and stars have been appearing and disappearing for eighty-four years, since I had a human existence, and all the dear ones that the Mystical Boatman, with muffled oars, has taken across the silent sea, are still watching and waiting to welcome others to the spirit home that can never have an end.

As I now turn my mind back to the long ago when those very mysterious raps at Hydesville started on their journey around the world, and the new and resplendent banner of Spiritualism was raised aloft, like a new "star in the East;" some of the present condition bring to me a sad mortification that it is still, at this late day, ever necessary to make the same old inquiry, "Watchman, tell us of the night; what the signs of promise are?" Must humanity go back and again creep over the long road before they can be sure of the way and walk firmly upright? Human beings came into life in a world that was organized; and all growth and improvements have followed after planning and organization. The world is full of knowledge and power; and knowledge always directs power, and discovers the many self-evident truths that can never vary. "In unity there is strength." "United we stand, divided we fall." "A rolling stone gathers no moss." The Spiritualists must organize; so when the question is asked, where art thou? the answer will ever be, "I am here, send me." Settled speakers, and mediums save transportation. The universal question ever has been, and was never more in the line of anxious desire than now: How can the great Ship of Spiritualism, that has been sailing so many years on the ocean of human thought, be kept going in the direction best suited to carry the glad tidings of great joy unto all people? The organizations with too many open doors are increasing, but ropes of sand will never hold when strength is needed. Societies of any kind should be upon a good, practical, common sense plan, that would insure protection and true harmony. An organization for meetings, seances or camp meetings is a family, and all the rules of the family are in full force.

It would be asking too much that societies and camp meeting disband because of outsiders being disturbed. Every organization should have an active committee of order and regulation. Try the spirits, and try those claiming to be mediums.

The great agitation and unrest all over the country, as to commercial mediumship and dishonest pretenders is nothing new. The present conditions are just what the unorganized, go-as-you-please class have allowed to exist and increase; and the Spiritualists, as a body, have had to suffer the reproach and are still responsible in a large measure. When a wrong appears, call it a wrong and overcome it. There are good and bad people in all the walks of life—bad ministers, bad lawyers, bad business men, bad women; rascals in high and in low places, and still there is a power of regulation and order that keeps a great busy world moving on and growing stronger.

I am glad to see that the sifting process among Spiritualists is more popular than formerly, when some of the show-pretenders visited many large towns, and did not call upon well known Spiritualists, and gave as a reason that they had no use for "Bundyites." Some of those shows in Boston would have an audience of a thousand. On one occasion, Mr. Colville lectured in a smaller hall in the same building to an audience of seventy-five people. The show ended in a row, and was closed by the police, after the ticket-seller with the money had left by a back door.

Let the right ever come uppermost.

DEAFNESS

Successfully Treated

By the Simplest Methods Yet Discovered.

Ninety-five percent of the cases of deafness brought to our attention are the result of chronic catarrh of the throat and middle ear. The air passages become clogged by catarrhal deposits, stopping the action of the vibratory bones. Until these deposits are removed relief is impossible. The inner ear cannot be reached by probing or spraying hence the inability of specialists to always effect a cure. Neither can ear drums cure deafness. But there is a scientific treatment for deafness and catarrh which is demonstrated every day by the use of Actina. The vapor generated in the Actina passes through the Eustachian tubes into the middle ear, removing the catarrhal obstructions and loosens up the bones (hammer, anvil and stirrup) in the inner ear, making them respond to the vibration of sound. Actina is also very successful in relieving ringing noises in the head. We have known people afflicted with this distressing trouble for years to be entirely relieved by a few week's use. Actina has always been very successful in the treatment of hay fever, asthma, bronchitis, sore throat, weak lungs, colds, headache and other troubles that are directly or indirectly due to catarrh. Actina will be sent on trial, postpaid. Write us about your case. Our advice will be free as well as a valuable book—Prof. Wilson's Treatise on Disease. Correspondent writes: "The mass-meeting to be held at Milwaukee, as per announcement in last week's Progressive Thinker, has been called off for the present, but the entertainment and dance will be carried to success, under the auspices of the Wisconsin State Spiritualists' Association, on Tuesday evening, June 9, beginning at 8 p. m., at 248 9th street, corner Cedar. This will be a union entertainment, and should be participated in by every Spiritualist in the city of Milwaukee and vicinity, at least. The good people at the head of the State association are bending every effort toward getting the Association out of debt, and should be aided in every way by all. A rally to the cause, and a uniting of the forces will do this without fail or delay. All should go as one in harmony into the work."

Secretary writes: "The Progressive Spiritual Society, at its anniversary meeting, Sunday, May 24, had as the principal lecturer, Miss Lina Schanbacher, graduate of the Morris Pratt School, and her subject was upon the Spiritualism of other days and the present, in which she drew a picture of the belief in spirit communion of the days of the ancients, showing the various phases of manifestation to prove the future life a fact, and then compared it with the manifestations of the present. She showed a vast deal of historical research, and had it all summed up and clothed in language beyond criticism. She is a fine representative of the School from which she graduated. Miss Rouble spoke briefly on the Lyceum work and referred incidentally to ordination and its sacred office. Mrs. Lichtig followed with high praise for the Lyceum work and placing special stress upon the important office of ordination, and how sacredly it should be cherished by those to whom it was conferred. She paid a high tribute to the work of Spiritualism all over the country. Mr. and Mrs Bloom did good work, Mrs. Bloom in the message work, as also did Mrs. Lichtig, and Mrs. Hilbert. The house was full and all were conscious of the good work being done by our workers for the cause. This was the first of the two lectures to be delivered by Miss Schanbacher, the next on Sunday evening, May 31."

Charles Barnes, the trumpet medium, was in the city last week, on his way to fill engagements at Quincy, Canton, and Peoria, Ill.

Brother Orrin Merritt writes from Genoa, Ill.: "An attentive and appreciative audience had the pleasure of hearing Dr. J. M. Peebles of Battle Creek, Mich., in this city Saturday and Sunday, May 24 and 25. We found in him a broad-minded, learned, deep-thinking man, who spoke with the conviction of the truth. No one could look at his gray hairs, think of his eighty-seven years, and yet doubt his sincerity. Dr. Peebles spoke not as a theorist, but as one who is absolutely sure of the truth of his convictions. He has made five trips around the world in made five trips around tthe world in search of the truth, and each time has come back more fully convinced than before on the subject of Spiritualism. His remarks left a deep impression on the minds of those who are in the dark, and I believe that much good will come of his lectures. Despite his advanced years, he is still vigorous and a fluent speaker, having the happy faculty of making his hearers understand. His words have not only caused the skeptical to think, but have put new life into the believers."

Mrs. C. Bergere writes: "The Fraternal Daughters held their last Wednesday evening meeting and get-together social, on Wednesday, May 26. Tests by Mrs. Susie Dill, followed by Mr. J. Mason Temple. Then dismissal, after which our musical entertainment began, with the sweetest music ever heard, by Mr. J. D. Norton, with his combination Harmonica Megaphone, and his $100 guitar, both of which he plays at the same time. Next came the singing by Mr. Vernon Short, and Miss Lily Goldstein, and the sweet little four-year-old Miss Gladys Gromke. Refreshments followed, consisting of cake, ice-cream and ice tea, all of which was liberally contributed by both the sons and daughters. Thus ended our last social and we thank all who have helped to make it and all preceding ones so profitable and entertaining. During the Summer the Daughters and their friends will meet every two weeks at each others houses, and the first meeting will be held at Mrs. C. Bergere's 508 Larchmont ave., on Wednesday, June 10. Take big Lincoln avenue car north to Larchmont avenue, then one block east to Lincoln street, 508."

Mrs. Squire writes: "The Church of All Souls will hold meetings Sunday evenings during the Summer. Service will begin at 7:30 sharp; doors open at six, at No. 220 So. Western avenue, near VanBuren. We will also continue our Ladies' meeting, Thursday afternoon. Come and bring a friend."

W. F. Peck writes from St. Louis, Mo.: "Will you kindly allow me to announce to my many good friends in the East whom I had anticipated meeting this summer that as I have accepted engagements to lecture in California during August and the fall months I must defer my eastern trip to a later period. I shall probably be at liberty after November to engage with any of the eastern societies that may desire my services. Allow me also to call the attention of friends and societies along the main lines of travel to the Pacific coast to the fact that I would be pleased to break the monotony of the long journey by giving a few lectures at various points along the way, and will make terms easy to meet. Those who appreciate a rational Spiritualism, based in Science and Natural Law, please address me immediately at 1817 Bacon street, St. Louis, Mo."

Rev. Charles M. Sheldon, the author of "His Steps", and other religious novels that have been translated into many languages and have had a wide circulation, has lately been lecturing in the east. He comes from Kansas, where women have voted at municipal elections ever since 1887; and in a recent address in Boston, he spoke warmly of the great amount of good that woman suffrage has done in his home state.

Jane Addams writes in the Woman's Home Companion: "If, both for their own sakes and for the good of the republic, women of property and women of education should be enfranchised, far more is the power of the ballot needed by the working woman, whose stake in the country is represented by her life, her health, her virtues, and the safety and happiness of her children. Working women need the ballot because they must possess some control over the conditions of their lives and those of their children, and in this twentieth century world the ballot box offers he only channel through which they can give expression to such legitimate control."

Kate W. Grove writes: "If any of Charlie Barnes's friends should happen to drop in, or you see anyone who would like to attend a good trumpet circle, please tell them that Charlie Barnes will be at his sister's, Mrs. Gill's, 118 South Kedzie avenue, between Madison and Monroe, 2nd flat, on Thursday and Friday of this week. He will give a trumpet circle Thursday evening and Friday also. Mrs. Gill's parlors are large and can accommodate as many as may come. Mrs. Gill, since her return from Florida, has taken a flat (2nd) at 118 So. Kedzie avenue, where she will hold her Thursday night circles as usual, and will be glad to see her friends."

E. J. Davidson writes from San Francisco, Cal.: "We have had State President, Mrs. Patterson, with us recently. She is certainly the most forcible speaker I have ever heard, just such a one as we greatly need at the present time. She has devised a plan to make her lecturing tour a success financially. After her lectures she calls on all present to contribute $1, and takes their names and addresses. Very few will fail to contribute when she appeals."

Miss A. M. Came writes from Cambridge, Mass.: "The Cambridge Spiritual Industrial Society held its last meeting for the season May 22. Mrs. Katie Ham was to have been the speaker, but on account of sickness, on her part, Mr. Frederick Nickerson took her place. This gentleman, who is a great favorite with the Cambridge people, did some fine work. The society will open its meetings Oct. 9. On June 18 the members and any friends who care to join them will hold an outing at Norumbega Park. A box lunch will be taken and the party will meet at the Brookline street transfer station at 9 o'clock. Should the day be rainy they will go the next fair day."

J. E. McMahal, Homeland, Georgia, writes: "Hurrah for our dear old Progressive Thinker. It's onward and upward, food for the soul. Ours is a grand and wonderful study. At every step we meet with surprises. If I had to live on creedalism, I would want to pass out and on. It is poor consolation for a man with the blues. I would think blessings to each one of The Progressive Thinker family, and may every one be a supporter of principle and justice; justice, the first of the divine virtues."

Rev. Alice Baker's address is at present 119 Spaulding Boul., Muskogee, Okla.

Spencer M. DeGoller writes from Bradford, Pa.: "I am glad to see The Progressive Thinker still vigorous and with its armor on, in the fight, and getting stronger all the time. Long may it live and grow, is my wish."

Mrs. D. Clemens served as hostess at the Tea Party given by the Sunflower Club, on Tuesday, May 26. Many readings were given by the following excellent mediums: Mrs. Howes, Mrs. Cleveland, Mrs. Ruth Squires, Mrs. Dr. Caird, Mrs. Frise and others. The next Tea Party will be held on June 23 at 70 E. Adams street. These Tea Parties are now quite an established feature with Spiritualists, and many good times are enjoyed.

Secretary writes: "Miss Schanbacher again held her audience spellbound at the Progressive Spiritual Society Sunday, May 31, and will speak for the same society Sunday, June 7. Dr. Burgess and Mrs. Hilbert gave the messages."

Frank T. Ripley will remain in Jackson, Mich., from May 27 to June 10. All letters and telegrams to be addressed to 328 Lansing avenue.

Hattie F. R. Peet, Cor. Sec., writes: "Members and friends of the Band of Harmony are cordially invited to attend the "summer social" which will be held at the home of Mrs. Dexter, 1000 N. Halsted street, on Thursday afternoon and evening, June 4. There will be interesting exercises in the afternoon, and progressive euchre in the evening. Ladies bring lunch as usual. Coffee served at 6 o'clock. Score cards, 25 cents; coffee checks, 10 cents. Come and bring your your friends."

From the Secretary of the N. S. A.

To the Editor: A telegram just to hand from N. S. A. Trustee A. W. Belden says that Prof. J. S. Loveland passed to spirit life this morning, and the body will be cremated at Los Angeles, California.

Thus one more of our capable and earnest workers for spiritual truth has passed on to the realization of his labors, and gained the promise he has told the people is their heritage. This good man has been rapidly declining in the physical for some time.

Too proud and heroic to ask favors, he waited in faith for the good news of help here or the reward in the soul land. The N. S. A. has been mindful of this noble brother's needs, but he kept saying, "I shall not want." And yet our trustee mentioned found he did have need of care and assistance. Brother Loveland was truly a pioneer in Spiritualism, and he has labored long for the truth and been faithful to the trust given him. We shall miss him on earth, but from the spirit his power will be potent for renewed energy. Others may take his place, but let us revere him in memory.

HOW MUCH DO WE KNOW?

Is Immortality Forced on All?—"No," Says the California Philosopher.—All Are Immortal Says Will C. Hodge.

To the Editor: I am induced to ask the above question at this time, because of a late article by our esteemed brother, Charles Dawbarn, and published in The Progressive Thinker. That he is a deep thinker and close student, a worthy representative of the philosophy of life as made known through modern Spiritualism, none will gainsay, but like all other individuals he must necessarily express what he deems as truth from his individual standpoint or that of his inspirers. Truth has been said to be "many sided," and inspirations must necessarily vary. Countless revelations have been vouchsafed to humanity all along the ages, and it is a well-known fact that they contradict each other. Thus the question of "How Much Do We Really Know?" becomes a very pertinent one.

The proposition that part of the human family is destined to individual immortality, while others are non-immortal, is by no reason a new one. The writer remembers discussions along this line more than thirty years ago, and the question has come to the front quite regularly, but is not as yet satisfactorily settled.

If we are children of nature and under the dominion of law, instead of caprice, then it seems to the writer that the proposition of the division of the human family into immortals and non-immortals can not logically be sustained, much less proven. True, there are progressive souls, and equally true there are those whom we deem non-progressive, but if there be a certain standard of unfoldment necessary to insure immortal existence, what is that standard and who shall draw the dividing line?

The old idea of dividing the human family into sheep and goats still holds sway, and there does not seem to be any danger of its extinction. We are still drawing the line of demarkation between "the righteous and the wicked, with no satisfactory nomenclature for the vast hosts of humanity who stand between these arbitrary divisions.

If we concede that none are wholly good nor wholly bad, the terms righteous and wicked should be eliminated from our vocabulary. No one should be exalted because of his good deeds, nor should any person be condemned for the opposite. All human beings are living the life that they necessarily must live, by reason of their organization, education and environment. These factors absolutely determine our every act and the quality of our lives. Our knowledge and our progress is not derived from reading books nor from the opinion of others, but by our experiences. The man who is born in the slums, educated in vice and compelled to suffer a degraded environment, will develop criminal propensities, and not even the gods can prevent it. He is nevertheless a child of the Infinite, though unfortunate, and must work his way upward through trials and tribulations and the hells of adverse conditions, and must necessarily suffer, but will not be annihilated.

If we concede that individual immortality is desirable, a really good thing, it would be the rankest injustice to confer this boon upon the more fortunate, leaving the unfortunate to perish.

But what about punishment? Are there no punishments for sin and wrong doing? Absolutely none. The young child beholding the fire, attracted by the flame and not knowing its nature, gets burned and suffers pain and thereby learns a valuable lesson, but is not punished. The same child in learning to walk gets many falls and bumps, and will continue to get them until able to stand upon its feet. The children of larger growth are under the same law. We try experiments and make mistakes. We continually stumble and fall; each experience adding to our knowledge, and this will continue until we develop strength to avoid the pitfalls and learn to stand alone.

The old ideas of rewards and punishments belong to the dark ages; they are dead; and should be left to peacefully slumber without hope of resurrection.

There are consequences attached to every act of our lives, but no rewards nor punishments. If this is not true, pray tell me who inflicts the punishment? Does not the real and only punishment for wrong doing consist in the condition in which our sins or mistakes leave us? Is anything more needed to complete our sorrow, our suffering or our degradation? Is there any human being or just God, who would add to such unhappy consequences, and would it not be the very height of injustice to deprive such unfortunates in spirit realms of the opportunity to outgrow their condition, no matter what their life in physical environment may have been?

It is not conceivable by the writer that any human being can be born without that spark of divine nature which, with proper environments, will insure individual immortality, provided immortality be a fact.

It is either a fact or it is not. If true, it is our natural inheritance without respect to persons. We do know, through mediumship, that we survive the change called death, because our friends and loved ones have survived, and this is the only way we can determine the fact, but when it comes to the absolute origin of humanity and our ultimate destiny, we know no more than was known ten thousand years ago. Scientific men have sought to comprehend the origin of mankind; various theories have been entertained; one man's guess being as good as another's but as yet they have not solved the problem, nor can they solve it without the aid of spirit, which up to very late date they have repudiated. We hear much these days regarding the ability of these gentlemen to settle the question whether we have any genuine phenomena or not, and a noted writer in a late article suggests that the whole matter be turned over to them for solution. Heaven save the mark! Are we so destitute of gray matter and common sense as to be unable to determine the matter for ourselves, but must refer it to a class who are naturally prejudiced and divided among themselves? For my part I protest against any such surrendering of private judgment, and will maintain that any phenomenon which is produced in my presence and for my own edification and satisfaction, must be judged by myself, and that myself and not another, must determine of what value it is to myself. By no means would I undervalue the results of scientific research and attainment, and I will heartily accept the co-operation of any class in the discovery and promulgation of truth, but when sixty years of mediumship has actually compelled these gentlemen to "sit up and take notice," I am not ready to yield settlement of the question to their decision, thus nullifying the work of our faithful mediums.

Individual immortality is the most stupendous fact which the mortal can conceive, or it is an iridescent dream. All are immortal, or none. In the discussion of the question each must decide for himself, but as to the fact, the matter has long been irrevocably settled. Of one thing we may be sure and can safely say: There is only one law for all alike; we have one common source and are bound to one common destiny (whatever that destiny may be) or nature is a cheat and the gods are partial.

THAT ELGIN PICNIC.

Do not forget the Picnic to be held at Elgin, under the auspices of the State Association and the Chicago Spiritualists' League. Everybody will enjoy this trip, the fresh air, the feast of reason and feast of the appetite, that always awaits them on these occasions at Elgin. This is to be established as an annual picnic, and should be the coming event of the season's opening. Good speeches and good messages—the ever-welcome spirit-messages will be a part of the order of the day, and the Children's Lyceum will receive its share of attention, and the children themselves—well they will be the guests of honor, and will enjoy the attentions to be given them, no doubt. All keep this event in mind.

OBITUARIES.

After a long sickness of two years, Mr. Alamando A. Reynolds of this city, passed over to the home of the soul, Sunday evening, May 10, as the sun was sinking to its home in the west, his spirit fled to the unknown. Mr. Reynolds was born in Hartford, Michigan, November 22nd, 1859, He possessed the knowledge that the death did not end all. Floral decorations were most beautiful, and many friends gathered despite the downpour of rain. The remains were taken to Griffin, Ind., for interrment. The services were conducted by Mrs. Nora E. Hill of Chicago. They were impressive and comforting. In the little country grave, on the hillside, under the spreading oak, they laid him to rest, all that was mortal, the spot he had chosen in the past for his last resting-place. Mrs. Elsie Reynolds wishes to thank the many friends for their kindness to her in her hour of bereavement and the beautiful flowers as their token of sympathy. COR.

Passed to spirit life, April 22nd, at her home in Washington, D. C., Mrs. Lucinda M. Reeves, aged 81 years. Mrs. Reeves was a native of Massachusetts and for many years a devoted and earnest Spiritualist; a reader and patron of The Progressive Thinker, and other spiritual papers, and was widely known and beloved. For a number of years this good woman held free circles in her home, at which mediums were developed, and also where well known sensitives gave undoubted evidence of the truth of Spiritualism. Mrs. Reeves was genial, kindly, benevolent by nature, and won hosts of friends, not only by her native simplicity and sweetness of spirit, but by her intelligence and love of truth as well. Mrs. M. T. Longley delivered the funeral address in response to a long-ago request, on April 24, in the Chapel of Lee's Crematory, after which the body was incinerated. Mrs. Reeves leaves one son, and many relatives, among them a niece, Mrs. Flavia Haskell, whose tender care and loving service to her invalid aunt was most touching and beautiful. A good woman has gone home. MARY T. LONGLEY.

Mrs. Jacob Waidley passed to the beyond at the home of her daughter, at Ashtabula, Ohio, May 13, aged 56, and on Friday, May 17, the funeral was held from the Spiritualist Temple in this city. The large concourse of friends attested to the high esteem in which she was held and all were deeply impressed by the beautiful discourse delivered by D. A. Herrick. The W. R. C. concluded the services in the temple. MRS. H.

Mrs. Loretta Clark Snook passed to spirit life from her home at Lake Brady, Ohio, April 14, 1908 having celebrated her 78th birthday the 18th day of March. She had been a medium since girlhood and was ever a staunch friend to every honest and true medium. She read The Progressive Thinker ever since it was published, and not only lived a Spiritualist, but was buried as one, having requested, while arranging all earthly matters, that D. A. Herrick conduct the services. A loving daughter, Mrs. Connor, did all to smooth her pathway in her last days that mortal could, and she, with a husband, Mr. Snook, miss her in the home, but some day she will reach down to him whose steps are tottering toward that other shore, and join hands as gladly and lovingly as she did twelve years ago, when Mr. Herrick joined them in marriage at Akron, Ohio. MRS. H.

Mr. Miller Haney Harsha passed to spirit life from his home in East Liverpool, O., February 4, 1908, aged 61 years. He was a member of the G. A. R. and a Grand Lodge officer in the Order of Red Men, and both orders assisted in the funeral services with Rev. D. A. Herrick of Ashtabula, Ohio, officiating. MRS. H.

Mrs. Ella M. Caldwell passed to the higher life, May 21, 1908, from her home in Chicago. Interment at Oakwood. Mrs. Mary B. Hill conducted the transition service.

Passed to spirit life at Columbus, Ohio, May 24, Mr. John K. Moore, a member of the First Spiritualists' Society. After an illness of six weeks, battlin with that terrible disease, typhoid fever, Mr. Moore had to say good by to his loving wife and mother, and step into the "other room." He was an earnest Spiritualist, also a man highly honored and respected by all who knew him. He will be greatly missed, especially in his place of business. He held a responsible position at the Ohio Penitentiary. The funeral was held at his home; the floral tributes were numerous and very beautiful; these speaking in tones much louder than human language, of the love and respect in which he was held. The undersigned officiated

ELIZABETH HARLOW.

Mr. Jacob Selmy passed to the higher life, at his home in Cleveland, Ohio, Sunday, May 10, aged 65 years. He had lived in Cleveland all his life. He spent last winter at Lake Helen, Fla. Just seven weeks from the day he returned he passed away. The services were held on Tuesday evening by the Masons, and Rev. A. Klimmel. On Wednesday morning his body was interred at Lake View, by the K. of P. fraternity.

How Syracuse Woman Took Her Wrinkles Out In Three Nights

AFTER MASSAGE AND BEAUTY SPECIALISTS HAD FAILED.

"Made Me Look 20 Years Younger."

Says Cincinnati Lady Who Tried It; "Now Past 40, but My Complexion Is Smoother and Better Than in Girlhood," Writes a Kentucky Woman, Who Used This Wonderful Process for Removing Wrinkles.

The Discoverer Offers to Give Particulars Free of Charge to All Who Write Her within Next 10 Days—Exacts Promise of Secrecy—Treatment Very Simple and Absolutely Harmless—May Be Used Without the Knowledge of Your Most Intimate Friends.

Ever since woman's beauty held sway over man and brought her power, influence and wealth, she has sought a way to stay the processes of old age and banish deep lines and furrows from the brow.

Chemists, beauty doctors and skin specialists have for centuries past vainly tried to fathom the sealed secrets of nature, and find a way to keep the beauty of youth in a woman's face and form.

Harriett Meta was no exception to the general rule of women. Trouble and worry left their unsightly lines and marks upon her face. She saw the beauty of youth giving away to the heavy imprints of coming age.

Her first resort was to the facial massage, cold cream and steaming pots; then next to beauty specialists; but all in vain. The wrinkles seemed, if anything, to grow deeper and deeper. Facial massage even appeared to stretch the skin; more wrinkles came. She had spent all the money she could afford to spend, and was ready to give up in despair, when one day a friend made a happy suggestion.

This gave her a brilliant idea. She set to work on the thing herself, and after several months' hard labor and almost endless experimenting she succeeded in producing a wrinkle remover, entirely different from anything she had seen or heard of. She tried it on herself, and lo and behold! it worked a wonderful transformation in a single night. She tried it a second night and her wrinkles were practically gone. A third night—three treatments in all—and her wrinkles had entirely disappeared and her skin was soft, clear, rosy, smooth.

Mrs. J. E. Black of Yonkers, N. Y., writes: "When I look into the glass I scarcely know myself, so great is the improvement. My wrinkles have entirely gone." Miss Gladys Desmond, the actress of Pittsburg, Pa., says: "Your treatment made my wrinkles disappear in one night. It is certainly a Godsend to womankind. I tried cold creams, skin foods and various advertised wrinkle removers, but they all failed absolutely and I confess I was very skeptical about your treatment, but in one night my skepticism had entirely vanished. When I looked at my face on the following morning and saw what a wonderful transformation had taken place I was sure at last I had found the right thing."

In speaking of her discovery, Miss Meta says: "Yes, I know it sounds too good to be true, but really I do not think removing wrinkles is half so wonderful as the telephone. Before the telephone was invented it appeared ridiculous to think of talking from New York to Chicago.

"Those who have used cold creams, etc., cannot understand how my treatment can act quickly. Yet, after all, it is very simple, and I wonder that some one did not discover the process long ago. My letters from patients tell the whole story. Here is one from a lady who says my treatment made her look twenty years younger: also letters from many others. I do not see how anyone can doubt in the face of such testimony as this. I tried cold creams, facial massage, etc., myself, without results, and I can thoroughly sympathize with them who have tried to get rid of wrinkles, and I am truly glad that I feel I can now offer womankind a surer and shorter way.

"I will give further particulars to all those who write me within the next ten days. I must exact a promise of secrecy from every one for my own protection before I give full information—you can use my treatment on yourself, or in your own family, but you must not tell what it is to outsiders.

"I guarantee my treatment will in no way injure your skin. On the contrary it will give it a soft, velvety feeling, and greatly improve your complexion, as well as banish unsightly lines and wrinkles. It takes only a few minutes to use it.

"Address Harriett Meta, Suite 290D, Syracuse, N. Y. I will send everything in plain sealed envelope, so that our correspondence will be strictly private."

ANGELIC POWER.

It Restored His Sight a Few Moments Before Death.—He Passes Away in the Midst of Joy.

"I can see! Father in heaven, I thank thee." The cry startled the nurses of the infirmary at the Masonic Home, at Broad and Ontario streets, yesterday afternoon. It came from Hezekiah T. Bailey, who for five years had been totally blind, and had been an inmate of the Masonic Home since last June. Sitting up in his narrow hospital bed, the old man, with an awed face, described with gloating delight, the various articles in the room. One by one he mentioned the chairs, the table and the medicine bottles in their methodical rows, and then, stretching out his arms to the window, he whispered over and over, "And God's blue sky over all. Oh, it is good! It is good!"

Although the old man has been ill from a complication of diseases for some time, his condition was not thought alarming, and with his restored sight he seemed to gain increased strength and vitality. The doctors who came to him pronounced his sight perfect, and for two hours he sat up reading the papers with a zest born of five years of darkness, and watched with unfailing delight and interest the passing of the clouds across the sky outside the window.

Sudden Passing Away.

Then suddenly he turned to the nurse and said quietly, "I'm very tired." Hardly had the words left his lips when he slipped back upon the pillows, and before the nurse could reach his side he was dead.

Two reasons are given for his death, one that the shock of his regained sight caused heart failure, and the other that the power to see was merely the final rally of a dying man.

Mr. Bailey was born in New York state on Aug. 5, 1831, and was a sailor during his early life. He then came to this city, where he was proprietor of a little hotel, long since destroyed, but known at that time as "The Astor House." He was a member of Bristol Lodge, No. 25, F. and A. M., and will be buried in North Laurel Hill cemetery on Tuesday.

The old man was a great favorite at the Masonic Home and the news of his restored sight soon crept about among the inmates, who came with bated breath to the infirmary after dinner to visit him. They found him dead. In his hands were still clutched the pictures and books which he had begged for in his great joy, but his face was turned towards the square of sky visible through the narrow window.—Philadelphia Inquirer.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

This department is under the management of
HUDSON TUTTLE.
Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Everyone has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected.
HUDSON TUTTLE.

J. M. Peet:—Q.—I enclose you a clipping from the Pittsburg Press, and I know your comments will be interesting to the readers of The Progressive Thinker.

A.—This clipping is an account of the execution of McDonald, for the murder of the women for whom he deserted his wife. He killed her deliberately with a razor, after a quarrel, such as erotic passion only inflames. He was a profligate and villain, and as far from salvation "through Jesus" as a man well could be. Yet at the last, two preachers came to his rescue, and by many prayers, thought they had him pretty well prepared for he kingdom.

McDonald professed to have been in early life a Christian. With sneaking unmanliness he lays the blame all on the woman he led astray. "Before I met the woman I killed, I led a Christian life with my family in England. After she came into my life all was changed." What kind of a Christian could he have been to desert his wife and children, and come to America with a woman so lost to justice as to lead or follow him?

The preachers thought this old religious feeling had awakened, but they were not enthusiastic, and here I wish to mark with emphasis the wonderful difference of opinion between the thoughts of these ministers, and those of twenty-five years ago. Then the criminal slipped through the hangman's knot directly to Jesus. The brightest crown was for the repentant murderer. Only the other day a belated minister sent the most heartless murderer directly to heaven because he repented, but hesitated over the fate of the poor girl victim. They did not know whether she had gone to hell or not.

An outside minister takes up the subject in the Press and leads still further from the old track.

The reporter says of the execution: "Altogether it was one of the most successful hangings that ever has taken place in the jail."

The commenting minister, who witnessed the hanging, says: "Taking human life, with the sanction and hand of the law, is not so fearful a thing as it seems. It is only the soft squeamishness of the sentimentalist which thinks and expresses itself otherwise. * * * The mass of men are not sorry" (for the hanging).

Again this reverend disciple of the loving Jesus, says: "Knowing this common sense of men, it was not surprising for the writer, who witnessed the execution of Willian McLeod McDonald at the county jail this morning, to find none of the terrible consciousness, supposed always to be present, among either the executioners or the spectators—the consciousness that the hanging was a gross and perverse thing to do."

"I was not overwhelmed by the end, nor shocked by the outwardly gruesome manifestations."

It gives him no shock to see a man swung from the gallows. He thinks it is the very thing to do whether the convicted is going to hell or heaven. He is in doubt about the destination, and the other two "spiritual advisers" are in the fog. Even Christ "leaves no appropriate dogma about the career of the soul after it has made its transit into the spirit land.

The murderer went to the gallows singing "Nearer, My God to Thee," and it is supposed that he had during his imprisonment got well along toward heaven.

It is a hard, unfeeling doctrine this clergyman teaches. He thinks the law vindicates the "sovereignty of God." He says:

"And if the truth were told, it would probably be that there are many persons, charges not only of the state, but wreckers of life at every point with which they come in contact, who would be well out of the way.

"The world would be better for the elimination of such persons. And, as a matter of fact, they are surely eliminated, if not peremptorily and summarily—that is, as we say unnaturally—nevertheless, at the last by the slow processes of impartial nature, which brings them to the dissolution of their physical, mental and spiritual beings. This execution, therefore, is merely, as I take it, a help to nature."

Love, charity, sympathy are unknown in this unfeeling belief. The "fit" are only worthy of preservation. The unfit should be destroyed, the sooner the better. This is the code of ethics of the savage, who carries it to its fullest conclusion. The malformed babe is destroyed, the helpless and aged, as soon as they become burdensome to the class are made way with. There is a strange sound in the worlds upholding capital punishment, in this age which has heard so much for its abolition. However rapid progress may be, there is always a rear guard of stragglers, walking with face to the old.

Pueblo:—Q.—How is it with feeble-minded people in the spirit land; the same as on earth plane, or will there ever be any enlightenment for them?

A.—According to spiritual law, the feeble-minded, who are such from physical causes, will not be affected by such causes after leaving the body. Time, however, is required to bring complete restoration.

Geo. E. Sly:—Q.—Was Solomon's temple ever built, or was it a myth?

A.—This question has been answered at length in this department. Careful and extensive explorations have been made on the site where the temple is said to have been erected, but not a vestige of foundation has been found. The temple was a myth, a "Jack-and-Bean-Stalk" story. The Hebrews were not architects. They were little removed from the roving Bedouins, whose highest skill is the construction of a skin-covered tent.

The temple never existed, except in the story-telling imagination of the Bible-writer, or at least there is not a shadow of evidence beyond their tale.

Q.—Is the center of gravity and the center of the earth the same?

A.—The center of gravity and center of the earth are not strictly the same. If the surface was absolutely regular, and the contents homogeneous, the center of gravity and center of revolution would coincide with the center of the surface sphere. But the surface is irregular and the material not homogeneous, and hence to preserve an equilibrium the center of of revolution must pass around a small circle. The gravitating force is calculated as though proceeding from this center where inequalities of substance and surface are balanced.

To explain the experiment said to have been made in a mine in Michigan nearly a mile deep. I have never read the details and do not know how reliable the experimenters were, or the carefulness with which they instituted the experiment. The plummets in a mine shaft could not be more than ten feet apart, and the measure must be taken between lines starting from the center of the earth and at the distance of 4,000 miles being only 10 feet apart. It will at once be seen that the difference in the distance between the lines per mile, dealing in round numbers, is not more than three one-thousandths of an inch. To measure such distance requires great skill, and delicate instruments.

If the plummets were of iron, or wire used for cord, attraction from iron in the walls would distort the result.

The result of this experiment does not prove the error of the theory, but of the mal-observation of the experimenters.

THE GOLDEN SHEAF.

This excellent work from the facile pen of Hudson and Emma Rood Tuttle, was the product of the holidays, 1907, so far as its appearance upon the book market is concerned. It is like all of the books that have been given the world by these gifted authors, for it is full of instruction from cover to cover. It is not too much to say that there is not a dull page in the entire book. It tells the story of fifty years in simple, beautiful, poetic language that gives every reader fresh courage and new inspiration with which to go on in the discharge of his own duties in life.

The references to other gifted speakers and writers in this work are numerous, and they are couched in kindly, fraternal words which go straight to the heart, proving that they go forth from the heart. The poems and letters with which the work abounds will do every reader a great deal of good. They soothe and instruct at the same time. It is a work of utmost value to all who think for themselves and are in search of fresh inspiration to larger thinking. It is a book that should be in every home and it is to be hoped that every Spiritualist will order a copy, either through The Progressive Thinker, or directly of the gifted authors.

Mr. and Mrs. Tuttle have made this world better because of their having lived in it. Their books have enriched the literature of the world and will live so long as language continues to be spoken.

This charming story of fifty years in public service and as comrades in life's great army will leave an impress for good upon all those, who, like the Tuttles, are struggling upward. Their personalities, their home life, their children, the transition of Rose, and all other tender things that enter into a perfect domestic life, are set forth in such a manner as to make every home better by reason of the impress that this home picture will give to the inmates of all other dwelling-houses here on earth. Especially interesting and valuable are the illustrations and cuts with which this work is adorned. Everybody wants to know how Mr. and Mrs. Tuttle look and will be equally pleased to see the faces of their talented children. I commend the work to every Spiritualist and liberal thinker throughout the world.
HARRISON D. BARRETT.

The Inspired Artist, Frederick Thompson.

To the Editor: Will you allow me to supplement the article in the issue of The Progressive Thinker relating to Frederick Thompson. I have known Mr. Thompson some time now, and watched his work grow. It has astonished me at times to observe the rapidity with which he has accomplished a task that often takes years of schooling in art circles, ere such results can be secured. I have stood before his pictures which are so full of life and vigor, that I have seemed to hear the wind rushing through the trees, which bend and creak and break off with a cracking sound, so realistic are they. I am under the impression that while some of the pictures are not what a critic would go in ecstasies over, yet considering the manner of their evolution, they will become world-wide in their fame, and do much to prove the influence of psychic phenomena upon the race. That to those who can possess copies they will become priceless gems in the near future, and those who see them will be honored in the remembrance. Mr. Thompson is very unassuming and will exhibit to all who visit his studios at 233 East 14th street, New York, but will not sell or part with them.

THE MORRIS PRATT INSTITUTE.

Annual Meeting—Closing of School Term—Interesting Exercises.

It certainly is a wise arrangement, that of holding the annual meeting of the Morris Pratt Association and the closing exercises of the school term on the same week, in fact, in part on the same days, thus enabling the members of the Association and its official Board to witness, and in some degree, participate in these interesting exercises.

The year just closed has been by far the most successful one since the opening of the school by that indefatigable and most efficient President, Moses Hull, six years ago. Not only in the efficiency of the methods so ably adopted and borne forward by Prof. Weaver and the other members of the faculty, but pre-eminently, in in the uniform superiority and excellence of the students. Prof. Weaver said that the students were, as a body, of a higher grade of intelligence and capability than the body of students of any preceding year.

A few had been called home on account of illness or other unavoidable circumstances in their homes, but not only did the students promptly answer the urgent call of Prof. Weaver, to be there at the opening of the school, but they remained, with the few exceptions referred to, to take part in the closing exercises—even those who were not graduating.

The year just closed leaves no doubt in the minds of the Faculty, the Official Board and the members of the association, as well as the friends of the school who keep in touch with the published accounts of its work, that it only needs a few more students and a few more staunch supporters, such as those who have contributed to the funds of the association during the past years, to place the school on an enduring foundation. When it is remembered that this is the only school where Spiritualists or those of liberal tendencies can send their young people and not have their knowledge of the Spiritual Philosophy made a stumbling-block, and when it is remembered that people of any age who desire to supplement their early education, or lack of it, with a distinct line of study that will qualify them for public writing or speaking, or in fact for any kind of life-work, when it is remembered that if the students have mediumistic gifts, these are not only not tabooed, but are, under wise guidance, encouraged, it becomes evident that this is just the place for those who wish and need the line of teaching pursued here.

Prof. Weaver comes out of this year just closed looking stronger and better in health than for years. (Which I may whisper in your private ear, he largely attributes to sleeping for the greater part of the year in the open air of his veranda "bedroom.") We are assured, however, that this is not a part of the school regime.

Mrs. Weaver, the ever efficient matron, and acting Secretary, gave a lengthy and most interesting report of the work of the past year.

This report is too lengthy to publish in full, but I am trying to embody the sense of it in this article. "The financial report accompanying her report leaves no doubt that the finances of the association are in such a condition that friends need not hesitate to contribute to the endowment, or other funds of the association. Prof. Weaver is a most conservative and economical treasurer.

The Annual meeting of the Association, held Thursday, May 21st, found a goodly attendance of members from different parts of the state, and country. Three trustees were elected for three years each: Mrs Cora L. V. Richmond (elected to succeed herself); Dr. T. Wilkins of Chicago, and Dr. C. L. Sanderson of Milwaukee.

At the board meeting following the general meeting, the officers elected by that body for the ensuing year were the same as last year: President, Dr. Geo. B. Warne; Vice-President, Judge Wm. Smith of Janesville, Wis.; Secretary, Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, Chicago; Treasurer, Prof. A. J. Weaver of Whitewater, Wis.; Assistant, and Acting Secretary, Mrs. L. S. Weaver, Whitewater, Wis. (the latter by appointment). I wish here to say that it is only my very great interest in the school that causes me to accept any office in connection therewith, and in the very nature of things I cannot perform the work of Secretary, with all its correspondence and work, bu Mrs. Weaver has so well and so faithfully performed this work that too much praise cannot be given her. During my summer travels and winters in my own place of work in Chicago, I have an opportunity to work for the school by interesting others.

The department of Oratory and Physical Culture, under Mrs. Nivers, has gone forward most successfully, and the classes of all grades in her department never were better or more efficient.

Mrs. Mattie E. Hull, in charge of the Psychic department, not only has the enthusiastic and affectionate regard of all the students who entered that class, but many spiritual gifts of a high order have been fostered and encouraged among the students.

Among the interesting reports made to the meeting of the Association was that of Miss Nivers, who was chosen last year as chairman of the Committee on Cuisine. The students decided to try the experiment of co-operative eating—all people being pretty well endowed with capacity in that direction. The particular form adopted is that in vogue in some of the popular clubs and noon-day restaurants: The Cafateria. I cannot here enter into a minute description, but the result was that all were delighted with the plan. Everyone pays for just what he or she eats, selecting from a sufficient menu prepared by a most excellent cook. The plan is simple and the expense to each person is considerably less than under the old system of boarding.

Some of the visitors who are rather tall or rather wide might have heavier bills to pay than some of the students, but it turned out that most of the board were guests of the Cafateria.

The chief things to note and to remember in connection with the Morris Pratt School are: It is in existence and has come to stay, as a gift to the Spiritualists of this country and the world if they but do their duty.

The year just closed has been the most successful and promising year of its existence.

Funds are needed, as in all such work, for bearing forward the work. The best way to contribute is to send students, or, if you know of none whom you can personally send or select, send Scholarships—(the amount required to pay for one or more students). Prof. Weaver, and all the faculty and board, know many who would like to attend the two years' course, but they have not the means.

Spiritualists, instead of leaving your your money for people to fight over, or a will to be set aside—if you make a will—use it now for the education of some young man or woman who wishes to become qualified to speak, write or teach the Gospel of Spiritualism that you prize so highly.

If you do not know what is taught in the school send to Mrs. Weaver for a catalogue. Send for circulars, keep posted.

The graduating exercises were most interesting. Tuesday evening was devoted to a recital by the Junior class in oratory, this work reflected the greatest credit on Mrs. Nivers and the students, and came as near perfection as anything of the kind experienced by those favored in being present.

Wednesday afternoon was devoted to the graduating exercises of those who received the Diplomas for the year. Original essays on "live" topics were given by four of the graduates, and very choice selections by the others. Having heard many public addresses from our own and other rostrums, I can truly say that those addresses would have done credit to any platform. Independence of thought, wide range of information and careful arrangement of ideas, these characterized the addresses one and all. These young people are now qualified to begin their public work.

All regretted the absence of the President of the Board, Dr. Warne, who with Mrs. Warne, were there last year. In his absence the Vice-President, Judge Smith, after a few appropriate remarks, bestowed Diplomas on the following named students: Miss Lina Schanbacher, Detroit, Mich.; Miss Eula M. Golden, Angola, Ind.; Miss Sarah Hull, Seattle, Wash.; Mr. Lawrence Hansen, Wheaton, Minn.; Miss E. Claire Rynerson and Miss Kate Rynerson, Seattle, Wash.

With this very imperfect account I feel that I must close my article, asking all friends interested to address any letters of inquiry or other communications relating to The Morris Pratt School, to Mrs. L. S. Weaver, Morris Pratt Institute, Whitewater, Wis.

ONE WOMAN WITH TEN PERSONALITIES.

Brain Specialist Says Ego of Every Person is Complex Collection.—Murderer Who Did Not Know of Deed.—Occult Matters for Spiritualists to Think About.

One of the most interesting lectures heard in London lately (as set forth in the Boston Sunday Herald) was that to which the Sociological Society listened. The lecturer was Dr. Albert Wilson, the well known brain specialist, and in the course of his address, which he called "The Psychology of Crime," he brought forward several living examples of his theory that the ego is not a single personality, but is complex and made up of several personalities.

An extraordinary woman with ten different personalities, whom Dr. Albert Wilson had under his care as a patient for about ten years, drew the doctor to the study of the question, upon which he is about to publish a book, says the New York Times. This young woman was at one time blind, and yet able to draw by touch; at another so hopelessly imbecile that Sir Thomas Barlow advised her removal to an asylum; and a few days afterward she was just a romping child.

After visiting many prisons and seeing the prisoners, he asked himself whether it was not possible that they were prisoners because they were the victims of circumstances beyond their control. And with a view to prosecuting this study, he went to the Salvation Army. There the authorities put at his disposal an unlimited number of discharged prisoners. He examined a great many, and he came to the conclusion that they were not as a rule, disassociated personalities.

There was one man, a murderer, who had spent 20 years in prison. He was quite sane, but directly he took alcohol he became another personality. When he was drunk he would commit crimes of great violence, and when he "came to" he was ignorant of what he had done. After he committed the murder he knew nothing about it until he had been some months in prison, when the whole story unfolded itself before him.

As an instance of a "sport" (the word is used in its botanical sense of freak) a highly respectable looking old gentleman with a white beard was shown on the platform. He came of a good family, but when he was about 30 years of age, being hard up, he borrowed something from his landlady, without asking her permission. The value was about $10, and he was sent to prison for seven years. In all he has spent 37 years behind the bars—and the whole proceeds of his thefts were not more than $25.

Dr. Wilson explained that this man ought to have been perfectly normal. But some hidden ancestral germ attacked him and he had gone on stealing ever since until he joined the Salvation Army.

A criminal produced, as the result of environment was the next exhibit. This was Williams, a notorious burglar, and long known as the most dangerous criminal in England. He was regarded with such fear that the home office sent instructions to the prison authorities that he was never to be approached except by two armed warders.

Dr. Wilson remarked that the man represented an almost perfect product of what he called an evil environment. "I have stated," he continued, "that this man has the brain of a cabinet minister. But I am prepared to go further than this. I consider he has a brain superior to that of many cabinet ministers, certainly superior to that of one I have in mind."

As a boy of 15 Williams was beaten by a drunken grandfather—his parents were dead—and he retorted in kind and left the house with a watch and $300 in money. After that he devoted himself to burglary and was favorably known to the late Charles Peace, with whom he collaborated in several burglaries.

During his whole career of crime he was never once caught by the police; indeed, both his sentences were incurred through the treachery of fellow accomplices. Ultimately he got a sentence for the term of his natural life, but was released when King Edward came to the throne. He is now an author.

Mr. Williams spoke at some length on prison treatment—spoke as a ventriloquist does. His lips do not move when he is speaking, a peculiarity due to his long imprisonment, and the necessity of communicating with his fellow-convicts without being seen or heard. His opinion is that imprisonment for the habitual criminal is no good at all. If 10 years do not reform a man nothing will.

The man who was formerly known as "the laziest man in London" was also produced for inspection by the audience. He proved to be a little fellow with a rather vacant expression. For 40 years he never did a day's work, but he is making up for it now, for he is scrubbing floors in the Salvation Army buildings on the 14-hours-a-day principle. And, as he says himself, he quite enjoys it.

Another object lesson was a stunted boy who was said to be 16 years of age, but who looked nearer 10. He is one of the waifs of London, never having known his parents, and he drifted into the workhouse. There, small and delicate as he was, he was set to pick four pounds of oakum for his board and lodging. He could not possibly do it, as the magistrate before whom he was brought, admitted. But he was sent to Pentonville for three weeks nevertheless.

Next time he failed he got a month, and the next time three months. And he might still be making alternate visits to workhouse and prison if more sensible people had not got hold of him and given him a chance in life.

This illustration led Dr. Wilson to remark that law and justice are in no way related, and that sin and crime are not necessarily coincident.

Dr. Wilson finds great difficulty in giving a definition to the word criminal. He has come to the conclusion that we are all potential criminals, and that much depends upon heredity and environment. On this ground he pleads that in many cases we ought not to treat criminals as responsible beings.

Education has not done much, in his opinion, except to turn the stupid criminal into a clever one, and sometimes to manufacture criminals by damaging the brain in youth. Criminals, in the broad sense, he believes, are Socialists pure and simple.

A BIRTH-DAY POEM.

(May 15, 1908.)

Live not for fame and power and pelf,
But love your neighbor as yourself;
This cannot be, with competition;
Unite, and work for Love's fruition.

Join hands and live the peaceful life!
'Tis better far than hate and strife.
Be not allured by selfish scheming—
Shake off such baneful, idle dreaming!

To help each other on the way,
And scatter blessings day by day,
Will bring sweet peace, and joy and strength,
And make our earth a heaven at length.

We'll lend a helping hand to need,
We'll rise above our cruel greed;
The unity of man we'll teach—
With "Each for all and all for each!"

Neglecting to co-operate
Is neither good, nor wise, nor great;
So hand in hand, O sister, brother,
We'll henceforth live for one another!

O, 'lumined souls of earth and skies,
Let human brotherhood arise!
With might of right dispel earth's blight,
Attain the reign of Love and Light!

REV. N. F. RAVLIN, D. D., ON REINCARNATION.

To the Editor: I have received the following personal letter from Dr. N. F. Ravlin, who, for many years, was noted on the Pacific coast as a learned, eloquent and popular Baptist clergyman. If there was a Baptist church to be dedicated any where in the great West, Dr. Ravlin was sent for to preach the dedicatory address. He dedicated more than thirty Baptist churches. He became convinced of the truth of Spiritualism. Loyal to the truth, brave as a lion, he withdrew from the church and went to advocating Spiritualism. Uncounted thousands from ocean to ocean have listened to this really GREAT PREACHER, as he most eloquently and convincingly preached the glorious doctrines of the Harmonial Philosophy. He is as true to the truth as he understands it as is the needle to the pole. He is now advanced in years, and has had the misfortune to become almost entirely blind. His companion has crossed the "Mystic River," and the grand old man sits in darkness. May the prayers and good wishes of his tens of thousands of admirers go out to him to bless him. He will be seventy-seven on June 1 next; but few men are richer intellectually and spiritually, but he is poor financially. Let his thousands of admirer remember him June 1. Here follows his letter to me which is characteristic of the loyal, fearless old soul.

"Will File His Protest on the Gates of Doom," If Re-incarnation be True.

To R. A. Dague,

My Dear Sir: I read your masterly article on "Re-incarnation" in a late copy of The Progressive Thinker, and then sent the paper to a dear friend not able to subscribe for it. This I do every week. I was sorry to part with this particular copy for I wanted to keep your unanswerable article on what I regard as the most absurd, irrational, illogical doctrine ever promulgated. To put it mildly, I regard the doctrine of re-incarnation with abhorrence. If it is true, I will file my protest on the gates of doom and refuse absolutely to submit. I would summon a congress of the brainy men of the ages, repudiate its government of any such a god, issue a new Declaration of Independence, and proclaim a New Constitution of the Universe.

My sister-in-law was reading to me your article. Before she had finished it I exclaimed: "That is the best argument on that subject I ever heard, and when she concluded and spoke your name as the author, I shouted, "Glory to God; it's from my old friend, Dague! Your article is unanswerable. * * * "

Spiritualists were a unit on the Pacific till a certain lecturer came here about twenty years ago with his re-incarnation doctrine. Since then, many have gone off on this crazy nonsense and are lost to Spiritualism. I ardently hope that your knock-down argument will open the eyes of the more intelligent portion of them.

It does not seem to me that any man or woman capable of logical reasoning can believe in re-incarnation.

It is contrary to Nature's law of sequence that everywhere governs the succession of events. It is destructive of personal identity and all the dear relationships known on earth.

I once met a lady in the East who claims to remember twenty distinct re-incarnations. One time she was incarnated as a horse and was killed in battle. Later she re-appeared as a lawyer. Now she is a fortune teller. What wonderful progress to be twenty times re-incarnated and not yet evolved above such a profession as that! On general principles she seemed to be an intelligent woman. * * *

Yours in the service of common sense, the most uncommon thing in this world.

Review of Rev. R. V. Hunter's Attack Upon Spiritualism.

A distinctly valuable service to Spiritualists has been rendered by Prof. W. M. Lockwood by publishing in neat pamphlet form his able and masterly reply to the attack of Rev. R. V. Hunter upon Spiritualism. Fairly and squarely he meets and demolishes the doughty Reverend's boldly asserted statements. We opine that the Rev. Hunter and others of his kind will hesitate before they attempt again to demolish Spiritualism, after reading Prof. Lockwood's review.

Additional value is given to this brochure by a striking list of names of Professors, Scientists, Actors, Lawyers and statesmen who accept the facts of modern Spiritualism.

For fifteen cents this valuable pamphlet can be procured of Prof. W. M. Lockwood, 923 Prospect avenue, Buffalo, N. Y.

Columbus, O., West Side Church.

The Ladies Auxiliary of the West Side Spiritual Church beg to report that their organization is working in harmony and has been greatly blessed both spiritually and financially.

Our new officers were elected on May 7, and are as follows: President, Mary Brickman; vice-president, Sophia Vogel; secretary, Mrs. Lucas; treasurer, Susanna Harris; trustees, Esther Feraurd, Mrs. Eva Verner, Mrs. Bakestraw.

On May 8 our church held its business meeting, and the Ladies' Auxiliary gave $25 towards the building fund of a new church. Our church society has been securing good speakers from different parts of the state, and outside the state, even as far away as Washington, D. C. The writer has been serving the society during the year, and our president is the right man in the right place. Our church is proud of him. May the great spirit bless this grand work and make the West Side Church a great light.

I wish to add that the indications are that our church is entering upon a new era of prosperity. There is promise that at no very distant day we shall be favored with an up-to-date church building in which to accommodate the people that are flocking to us for the ministry of the spirit.

THE ETHER SEAS.

Contain the Germs From Which All Forms Are Derived.

From out the deep seas all forms came.—Science.

In this free country a man may write his own text and preach from it if he chooses to do so; or he may take a text penned by some ancient philosopher and preach from it, drawing truths to our own heart from every point of Nature's compass; but of the ether seas, what of them; and where are they located?

The ether seas are the illimitable spaces of Nature, and as the word 'sea" indicates, are a restless ocean of life, ever active, ever moving, an ever pulsating heart that beats eternally, beats the harmony of nature; an eternal sea of life out of which all forms came; nor can we perceive when nature first began moulding forms. Forms were; forms are, and forms shall ever be.

But forms in nature are not all of one mould. It seems that within these ether seas lies the entific germs, corpuscles, nuclei or force-centers of which was moulded every form of life that ever did exist, does now exist, or ever shall exist, be that form a human, an ox, a horse, an acorn, an apple, a sea-urchin or a whale.

Why this is so, it seems no one can tell. That this is nature's unfolding seems self-evident; if not, how came nature's varied forms? Spontaneous generation, if such could possibly be, it seems, would produce only a conglomerate mass with no definite form. Yet we have a myriad forms of objective life on earth to-day, with myriads such forms existing in the past, and analogy loudly proclaims shall exist in the far future.

Why were Nature's life forces thus made objective?

This question perhaps no man can answer, yet corpuscles, entifics, and as Prof. Henry, of the Smithsonian Institute would say, "Nuclei or force-centers have been moulded into objective life in trillions of different forms.

But where shall we find data on which to base an opinion as to the origin of form?

This is a necessity in the direction of right conclusions, and I can do no better than to assume the fact of self-evident necessity of eternal life forces. Each of such forces possessing the inherent power, on some propitious day, of unfolding its nature objectively, encasing its own heart with negative corpuscles of its own nature, thus to fill a mission, as it were, in Nature's economy that never could have been filled in any other way.

Nor could the corpuscles that aggregated to mould the human have been aggregated to mould the form of the ox or other forms of life.

Eternal life has necessities which can only be gained through evolution, and as evolution is Nature's law necessities in the economy of Nature will follow each other.

The wheels of evolution never turn backward, but ever forward, ever bringing the virues of Nature into economic use, and thus, in my opinion, lays the claim of reincarnation in the shade.

But do facts warrant the claims I have made? To some extent at least. We have knowledge of life beyond the grave. From where did these spirit forms come? Like all other forms of objective life, from out the depths of ether seas, wending their way, as it were, on evolution's wheels, step by step, to meet the necessities of one of progression's days. Eternity consists in days, or epochs of progression, and each such day has its needs which must be supplied from the preceding flame of life.

But do these corpuscles, nuclei or force-centers form intelligence?

Defining intelligence to be conscious relationships, I answer in the affirmative—conscious of existence on that plane of life, and it may be to all that pertains to it; but on reaching a higher plane of life this conscious relationship seems lost to some extent, or entirely in oblivion's night. But as evolution had new days to come, the retentive powers of the unfolding entity grew stronger until now those who have preceded us to the next unfolding can return to us and speak of things of the past and also of the prospects of the future.

I have met those who claim that nature is one eternal round of repeating itself. That man runs his epoch race, fills his complete mission there, and then sublimates almost to annihilation, finally drifting back to the cosmic seas, and takes his place as a force-center, there to again, at the imperative call of necessity, take its place in the unfolding columns of evolution, repeating itself. My spirit friends deny this claim as far as they know, but it seems that men of science might find an analogy in the philosophy of life that might have some bearing one way or the other on this question.

"The Searchers."—A most entertaining book by Stephen K. Szymanowski. This interesting story of a series of pathetic experiences which take place in the city of Los Angeles, extols the noble sentiment of family duties and love for family ties. While the simple narrative may attract the attention of the general reader, the the timely reflections upon the deeper problems of life are bound to interest a thinker. Many up-to-date subjects such as occultism, metaphysics, re-incarnation are discussed in a most instructive manner, while a beautiful, pure love story runs through the whole book. Published by the Southern California Printing Co. Price, $2.00).

"How to Train Children and parents," Mrs. Elizabeth Towne takes the position that in many cases it is the parents that need the training more than the children, and advises parents to look to themselves. Twenty-five cents could not be better spent than in buying the book. Anyone that has the care of children should read it. Price 25 cents.

"Universal Spiritualism." Giving a view of Spiritualism from the earliest time, and in all nations. By W. J. Colville. Price $1.00.

"From Soul to Soul." Poems of the heart, by Emma R. Tuttle. Price $1.00.

"Spiritualism and the Law." A Series of Papers Compiled from Legal Authority by the Hon. Charles R. Schirm of Baltimore, Md. This pamphlet is one that every Spiritualist should read. It is a subject that people are not familiar with. Price, 25 cents.

Sowing the Seed—Soul-Growth.

"A sower went out to sow his seed, and as he sowed, some fell by the wayside, and it was trodden down, and the fowls of the air devoured it.

"And some fell upon a rock, and as soon as it was sprung up it withered away, because it lacked moisture.

"And some fell on thorns, and the thorns sprang up with it and choked it.

"And others fell on good ground, and sprang up, and bore fruit an hundred fold.

"He that ears to hear, let him hear."

Viewing the universe as a whole and in particular, the mind becomes amazed in that it fails to comprehend its vastness and its purposes. As the consciousness of the human develops its capacities, there comes into view very many conceptions of the conditions, operations and developments that lead the soul into higher and vaster explorations.

The process of soul-growth seems to be the theme for contemplation in the text quoted. The illustration of the parable shows how the germ-principle in the seed sown is developed favorably, or unfavorably for lack of proper conditions for its expanding into fruitfulness. The grains that fall into congenial soil take root, flourish, and fulfill their growth in all respects; so with the soul-germ that descends into the proper environments, fulfills its destiny in traveling in the path that leads to godliness. The seeds that meet with unfavorable conditions become unfruitful and serve no purpose designed by the sower. On the spiritual side of the subject it is found the soul-germ has not reached a state promotive of progression,

The indifferent, the sluggish, the worshiper of material things, are likely to become extinct unless some, peradventure, comes to the rescue and speed the offender on the way to loftier attainments.

The incarnating ego descending into the realms of matter, comes for experience to fit it for citizenship in the various planes of existence following the changes in its pilgrimage, and unless rightly developed, it may meet obstacles that will retard its growth for ages, and if persistent in its refusal to expand into godliness, may be deprived of its personality and have to begin over again its career in the far-off ages of the future. How many souls in the past may have met this fate cannot be estimated, and perhaps it is for this reason there has been no communications received by the world they decline to progress in.

"The soul that sinneth, it shall die," means just this: The complete extinction of its personality, because of its pertinacity in refusing to accept the means of progress; yet there is the possibility of rescue for the impenitent if it accept the condition.

"Have I any pleasure at all that the wicked should die? saith the Lord God, and not that he should return from his ways, and live?"

"Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool."

This is certainly an incentive for the disobedient soul to halt and consider the perilous situation it is in, and still pursuing.

The fact that opportunities arise to save the soul from perdition may be likened to the current of a rapid stream, on which float the debris and flotsam, and carried to the ocean; at the same time the lighter particles work their way to the shores, and there lie until some freshet sweeps all on the surface before its mighty force; and so with the laggard and indifferent souls which are afforded privileges to join the throngs of progressive entities along the golgotha way of earthly experience.

"Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap," is the law of both physics and moral. There is no forgiveness nor substitution of sufferers. Each and every act contrary to law must be recompensed by the offender alone. To avoid repetitions of such experiences, there must come a radical change of conduct and the pursuing of the good and the right.

In these times of wrong actions and selfishness, it were well the masses of humanity pause and consider the results that follow the violation of law.

Psychic Unfoldment

No one can unfold all the phases but each one can unfold some phase of psychical power, by which he can demonstrate his own Divinity and his immortality. My system will teach you how. It has been doing so over (15) fifteen years. Spiritualists who believe in their own circles have found it a great help of practical benefit. It is endorsed by hundreds of students. All declare it a revelation. It is sane, scientific and practical. Read a few testimonials: "The lessons are remarkable."—Dr. David Crichton, Newtyle, Scotland. Immortality Not Forced On Any One.

The Views of a Prominent Medium—The Degraded Spirit Is Finally Disintegrated, as Set Forth by the California Philosopher, Charles Dawbarn.

Yes, the distinguished Pacific coast philosopher has presented thoughts which have attracted a great deal of attention. To me they are important witnesses as to what was given me by a controlling spirit some over a year ago. When first receiving the seemingly strange philosophy, I did not care to impart it to others. I feared ridicule and strong opposition; but now when seeing it from the pen of our noted Charles Dawbarn, I no longer hesitate to give the important information that was handed me from my reliable guide, who likewise claims that the so-called dark spirit has not evolved the brightness of the one we call our angel visitor. He also states that the retrograding spirit is on the road to extinction, and to actual disintegration of his personality; and positively affirms that he will again appear in another form of existence, but not in a personality that belongs to another soul.

I will give a part of what I received from my guide, my questions and his answers. It may not agree with all that has been handed out on this subject; but we all have a right to express ourselves, so I hand it forth, and let criticism be the result.

Q.—What is the outcome of continual retrogression?

A.—The wrongdoer finally destroys himself by his own hand. The low, degraded mind with its abnormal appetites for lust naturally assists in disconnecting itself from the divine life, therefore subjecting its personality to disintegration.

Q.—Does the real man or soul germ of life ever become extinct?

A.—Life is eternal, therefore it can not die. The soul germ is a part of the divine life, and is self-sustaining, so it can not become disintegrated. Divinity is the purifying element of humanity; hence when personality becomes a man of corruption, it sends forth a destructive influence and the organism is no more in form. The scattered thoughts exist awhile longer, but without individuality can do no more harm to the sensitive side of life. The freed soul germ again is forcibly attracted to the material plane of life for another personality, and under the same condition as before it finds expression through the positive and negative laws of life.

Q.—How low must the personality become before the final dissolution takes place?

A.—When all that is divine ceases to be, then the personality is a fit subject for the dissipation of its degraded condition.

Those who have not made a study of the dark side of spirit life may say, "Such Divinity is cruel. God is love and will save all his children." This is just what the seeming cruelty is doing, for it is destroying the polluted personality so that good may take its place for a better individuality. The SOULS of men are the children of the living God, not the personalities, who are subject to evil as well as good. Yes, God is love, for he kindly delivers the immortal soul when all hope of a better personality is gone. The orthodox church claims that all things are possible with God; if this were true our world would long have been a place of paradise. Some of our Spiritualists positively assert that there is no evil and think strange of the Christian Scientist for saying, "There is no pain." My reason and experience teach me that both pain and evil exist.

I, as a missionary medium, have helped a great many evil spirits to a purer state of living and to an understanding of their degraded condition; but some are so low in vice that they can not be affected. I have watched these closely for years and really apprehend that they are retrograding. This is why I have asked my guide what would become of those that were continually going backward. As his mission is to help sin-sick souls I have great confidence in what he tells me regarding anything of this kind.

With my experience as a medium I have had great opportunities in knowing that there is an element which is in opposition to good in spirit life as well as here on the material plane. It must have a name. Why not call it evil? Why should we call it undeveloped good? Good does not come from a lower state, but from a divine source. It may seem to come from a lower state on account of its unfoldment in nature. The crude material is only becoming more fit for the higher to act upon. Good and evil have always existed as opposites, just as positive and negative forces have. The positive element is life eternal; the negative is subject to disintegration. When a personality loses all of its positive force it begins to crumble into particles, so when greatly corrupted it is soon disintegrated by the divine power that must have all things pure. The personality may seem destroyed on account of its blotted out existence; but as nothing can be annihilated in nature the fragments of the personality again appear in another form of life. While passing through the testing process the fragments are purified, thus becoming fit for further use. The God, or the soul of our universe possesses a large amount of acquisition, hence there is no waste of its material; but as the great architect has a strong taste for perfection, it is ever remodeling its tarnished handiwork.

Some might wonder why such a doctrine as this was not given through all mediums. Their guides may be more interested in some other matter, or they might feel that so unpopular a philosophy would put a stumbling block in the way of their instruments. Most mediums might not be adapted to receive this kind of information; and if they were doubtful regarding the matter, that alone would close the door to impression. In some cases the spirit control might not believe the doctrine. Not all spirits are educated concerning every law in spirit life. Many people in this life doubt spirit return, but that does not make it untrue.

The most brilliant do not always uncover all the hidden mysteries.

In this life many doubters have lived so we must expect them over there.

In conclusion I will say that every mystery should be uncovered and thoroughly investigated. Pure normal personality might clothe every soul if the world was rightly educated in conserving that which produces individuality.

HEROIC WORK SAVES HER.

Mrs. Carrie M. Hinsdale, President of the Texas State Spiritualist Association, Has a Close Call.—A Five-Hour Effort Succeeded in Saving Her Life.

Five hours' work against the torrent of water pouring over Arlington Heights boulevard at the city park Sunday was necessary to effect the thrilling rescue of Mrs. Carrie M. Hinsdale.

Mrs. Hinsdale's home is on the north side of the boulevard and opposite the new park entrance, and her attractive yard and flower garden are a familiar sight to those who have driven or ridden along the road.

She awoke Sunday morning to find her home surrounded by the flood and the front yard deep in water. With her was little Bella Hayworth, 12 years old. Other neighbors had fled during the night and Mrs. Hinsdale was without means of calling help. With the little girl's aid she took a sheet and painted on it the word "HELP," and hung the sheet on the front porch of her home. Two men who drove down to the park Sunday morning and tried to cross the flooded road, saw the sign, but were unable to reach her. They gave the alarm, however, and at once attempts were begun to rescue the occupants of the house.

Exciting Attempt at Rescue.

A little after noon Dick Zimmerman, a former policeman, and Patrolman Nichols rode into the flood and swam their horses to Mrs. Hinsdale's home. To get there Patrolman Nichols had to cut through a barb wire fence. Zimmerman took the little girl on his horse and Mrs. Hinsdale mounted behind Nichols. The horses started swimming back against the swift current and Zimmerman's with the lighter load reached the shore safely.

Nichols' horse either lost its balance or stepped into a hole, for it suddenly went down. Instantly Nichols jumped off, thinking the horse could swim to shore with Mrs. Hinsdale. It was unable to do so and sank twice, Mrs. Hinsdale holding it around the neck.

Seeing her peril, Nichols turned and attempted desperately to swim against the swift current, but was unable to do so. Meantime Zimmerman, seeing what had happened, bravely rode his horse into the deep water a second time to aid Mrs. Hinsdale and Nichols. Before he reached either of them Mrs. Hinsdale had succeeded in reaching a fence, where she clung with only her head and arms above the water. The horse, freed of its burden, swam down with the current to safety.

Nichols also swam with the flood to a near-by house. Zimmerman was able to help Mrs. Hinsdale to the porch of a house a short distance north of the boulevard, but was unable to start back with her.

Men Aid With Rope.

By that time more help had arrived and a long rope was carried out into the flood by men who waded until the water was up to their necks. One man swam across the boulevard and carried the rope to a tree on the north side of the road. Slack was taken in the rope and another man swam with the rope to the house where Mrs. Hinsdale was.

Then Will Houghton, who lives near the city park, and G. W. Moser started for the house in a boat, guiding themselves by the rope. They reached the house, got Mrs. Hinsdale in the boat and started back for the south side of the boulevard. As they got half way across, the crowd, which numbered nearly 2,000 persons, broke into a cheer, but just then the men lost hold of the rope, the boat swung round, nearly capsized, and started down stream. By means of a paddle Moser was able to guide it up to the house whence they had started.

A second start was made and this time the men were successful. They crossed the boulevard, brought the boat to where the water was only three feet deep, and from there Mrs. Hinsdale, half fainting from exposure and the chilly plunge she had made was carried to safety by Chief Maddox and another volunteer.—Ft. Worth (Texas) Telegram.

Truly a Grand Spectacle.

Christian and Pagan Religious Influence, Nineteen Centuries Apart, Expressing the Same Thought and Hoping the Same Hope.

"Count Tolstoy, the Russian author, celebrates his eightieth birthday this summer, but expresses his preference for death. The Paris Daily Mail prints his reply to a friend who congratulated him recently on the approach of his birthday, which ran as follows: 'It is another happiness that I await—Death.' In a letter which is published in the Paris Matin he amplifies this saying and adds that all earthly life is a dream and that death is the true awakening. This letter runs as follows:

"'All our life, from birth to death—is it not, with all its dreams, itself a dream? Does not our belief in its reality spring solely and entirely from our ignorance of any other life more real? Our earthly life is one of the dreams of another and more real life, and that other life is a dream of yet another life, and so on ad infinitum, even to the last life, the life of God.

"'Death in youth is as when a man is awakened before he has slept full measure. Death in old age is as when a man wakes of his own accord after good sleep. Suicide is as a nightmare which a man banishes by remembering that he is asleep; he makes an effort, and he wakes.

"'Deep sleep, without dreams, is comparable to semi-bestiality. It is the sleeper conscious of what goes on around him, and ready to awake at any moment, who has knowledge, though but vague, of the life whence he came and whither he shall return.

"'Even in this present dream-life we feel that which the new life will perhaps make real to us. The earthly form in which the awakening of our knowledge of the true life finds us appears as a limitation to the free development of our spirit. The true life begins when that limitation is removed. This idea embodies all the knowledge of the truth which gives to man the consciousness of eternal life.

"'I believe with all my soul in what I say. I feel, I know with certainty that in dying I shall be happy, that I shall enter a world more real.'"—Literary Digest.

Turning our ears to the past, and listening across the expanse of nineteen centuries, we hear the voice of Cicero, put by him into the mouth of Cato, the Censor, saying:

"It likes me not to mourn over departing life, as many men of learning have done. Nor can I regret that I have lived, since I have so lived that I may trust I was not born in vain; and I depart out of life as out of a temporary lodging, not as out of my home. For nature has given it to us as an inn to tarry at by the way, not as a place to abide in.

"O glorious day! when I shall set out to join that blessed company and assembly of disembodied spirits, and quit this crowd and rabble of life!

"For I shall go my way, not only to those great men of whom I spoke, but to my own son Cato, than whom was never better man born, nor more full of dutiful affection; whose body I laid on the funeral pile—an office he should rather have done for me.

"But his spirit has never left me; it still looks fondly back upon me, though it has gone assuredly into those abodes where he knew that I myself should follow.

"And this my great loss I seemed to bear with calmness; not that I bore it undisturbed, but I still consoled myself with the thought that the separation between us could not be for long.

"And if I err in this—that I believe the SPIRITS of men to be IMMORTAL—I err willingly; nor would I have this mistaken belief of mine uprooted so long as I shall live.

"But if after I am dead, I shall have no consciousness, as some curious philosophers assert, then I am not afraid of dead philosophers laughing at my mistake."

TOLSTOY AND CICERO, two of earth's greatest names are here presented.

Toilstoy, a scion of the Russian aristocracy, which represents and defends an autocracy the most cruel and brutal that now curses the world.

This old man is a dreamer of dreams, a writer of fiction, a hater of war and its bloody atrocities, a man of inspired genius, a prophet and philosopher of more than Stoic virtues and purity.

Although surrounded by an INSANE LUST for money, which is everywhere corrupting the morals of civilized men, he steadfastly refuses to take money as a compensation for the handiwork of his pen. He fearlessly denounces the sins and iniquities of the worst government on earth; yet the frozen regions of Siberia hold no terrors for him. And why? The reason is plain. His name and his character are known and loved to the uttermost limits of civilization. Even the Czar has some conception of the force and effect of moral influences.

Cicero, the greatest product of the ancient Italian civilization, a statesman, a patriot, a scholar, an author, and above all, an orator, more richly endowed with the divine gift of eloquence than any other of the sons of men.

He stands pre-eminent as the representative of the highest culture, both moral and intellectual, then existing—the exponent of the purest morality of his time.

To him we are indebted for all we know of the Greek systems which succeeded the schools of Plato and Aristotle.

He was, of course, the sworn enemy of that wicked Triumvirate which was organized for the overthrow of the Roman republic. They could not overcome his mighty influence—he must, therefore, be removed—not deported to Gaul—but assassinated. Consequently in the year B. C. 43, and at the age of 63, he became the victim of a hired assassin. He died a martyr to the cause of morality and decency.

Cicero, B. C. 43; Tolstoy, A. D. 1908, two of the world's great men, standing 1,951 years apart,—one developed under the Pagan religion and the other under the Christian religion—one from the sunny South and the other from the frozen North—both expressing the same thought and hoping the same hope!

Does history afford a grander spectacle?

Astronomical Facts.

In an article written by a correspondent is the following: "Then he asked the lecturer how long it would take for a Spiritualist to get to heaven beyond the stars and clouds, seeing the nearest star is about 38 millions of miles away."

If it is quoted correctly it would show an ignorance of astronomical names and terms.

There is no star at that distance. Mars, the planet which shines by borrowed light, is about that distance from the earth at times.

But the nearest star is at a distance so far from earth that light traveling a the rate of 182,000 miles a second, will take four years to reach us, and of course, if such terms are used in a scientific question, people of learning and erudition will only sneer at the person exposing his ignorance of facts and terms used by truly scientific men.

Let all Spiritualists learn that outabyss of 60 millions of millions of side of our planetary system is an miles before you reach the nearest fixed star, which shines by its own inherent light. Planets are never called Stars by scientific men.

From this slipshod way of presenting facts from the spiritual rostrum comes very pertinent criticism.

"Call Them Back!"

A SAILOR'S NARRATIVE.

Vivid Experiences Illustrating the Nearness of Spirit Life.

I forget the year I sailed from Boston with a cargo of merchandise, for a port in the State of Maine. There was a strong breeze from the S. S. E. At sundown we were near the Isle of Shoals, with a heavy wind from the S. E., with threatening clouds portending a coming storm. I deemed it not prudent to run for the Coast of Maine with my deep laden vessel, in view of the prospective storm, so I shaped my course for the mouth of the river, upon which Portsmouth, N. H. is situated. It being dark when I got in, I was unable to clearly judge the distance it was from the shore, when I came to anchor. As it happened I got a little too near the shore, and when the tide went out, the rudder struck the bottom, and was unhung and gone. I took a pole we had and stuck it down in the mud, at the stern, so if the vessel should swing, by change of wind, or otherwise, I would know the location where I thought the rudder ought to be, if it sunk. Of that, however, I was not sure.

Having breakfast, we commenced search for the rudder. The water being thick and muddy we could not see bottom. I tried to feel it with boat-hooks, but couldn't find it. I looked along the shore, and finally I decided that it must have been carried out of the harbor with the ebb-tide. So I went on shore and engaged a ship-carpenter to make a new one. He showed me where to set my vessel up against the wharf, so he could come in the morning when the tide was out, and take the measure and make the rudder. All well so far.

Bed-time came and we went to bed, "Turned in," as the sailors say. I don't know how long I had been asleep, when I plainly saw, standing beside my bed (bunk) a man whom I did not know, looking at me, and he said, "I can tell you where the rudder is."

I replied, "I wish you would."

Then he said, "You come with me."

I went with him. We went out over the water to the pole I stuck in the mud in the morning. Then he said, "Do you see that pole you stuck down in the mud this morning?"

"Yes."

Then he said: "Look on the bottom, about 10 feet S. E. from the pole." I did so, and there lay the rudder. I saw it plainly, although the water was thick and muddy. Then he said, "You come here tomorrow morning when the tide is out, and you can get it."

Just then I partially turned to look at him, and I awoke from sleep. I was surprised, as never in my life before, to find it was a dream, for I never did anything with any person more natural in my life. It left an impress of truth upon my mind. I had seen the ruder. I knew it was there.

The morning came. I took a man with me, in the vessel's boat, with a boat-hook. We went to the spot indicated. I took the boat-hook, and put it down where I had seen the rudder, and hooked it the first time. We could not see it upon the bottom, because the water was thick and muddy.

This is the solemn truth. I have no comments to make. You can draw your own conclusions.

I Heard a Voice—A Tale of the Ocean.

Having delivered a cargo of lumber to the consignee on the Island of Guadeloupe, one of the Windward Islands, bordering on the Caribbean Sea, I came down to Turk Island, one of the Bahamas, and took on board a cargo of salt for North Carolina. Leaving the island in thick and hazy weather, I shaped my course for Cape Hatteras. A mild trade-wind, about a five-knot breeze, constant in duration, swept us gently on toward our destined port. On the third day out, I knew by dead reckoning that we were nearing our destined port.

Continued cloudiness had prevented me from obtaining an observation of the sun, therefore I was not able to determine my exact location. The wind was getting variable, we were in the Gulf Stream, I knew by the temperature of the water. The wind was still fair. What shall I do? To run for land without the proper knowledge of my location, would be a reckless risk of vessel and our lives. On the other hand, I was in danger of losing the favoring wind. Just at this time the cloudiness lifted in the north, and the sky and stars came out clear and bright.

It then occurred to me that I might find the latitude by the North Star if the horizon should remain well defined. I got my instrument. With a little effort I caught the star's reflected image in the mirror. I measured its height, with all possible care, under the conditions. I calculated the latitude by it, and it seemed to me that it ought to be about right, but could I trust that star? Could a possible mistake occur? I thought to run. Then I dare not. In this perplexing state of mind I was walking the deck, when a clear and distinct voice, just over my right shoulder, said: "GO AHEAD! YOU ARE ALL RIGHT!"

With that voice came the conviction of its truth. I took the course the star had given me, and in two hours made Hatteras' Light, as straight as if shot from a rifle. I passed up the coast South-west of Cape Hatteras; weather thick and threatening; land indistinct. By two p. m. I was opposite what I deemed the place of entrance to the North counties of North Carolina, and run in; but I soon discovered I had made a mistake. I had overrun my mark. I was embayed inside of Cape Lookout Shoal. The wind had changed to the S. W. I must now beat to windward in order to extricate my vessel from the dangerous surrounding. Night was near, with increasing cloudiness, and strengthening gale. A deep laden vessel with a heavy sea, midst dangerous shoals, was not a "hymn of joy," but like Shakespeare's sailor boy, "Though the frail mast should shiver like a reed and rent canvas fluttering, strew the gale, still must I on."

I stood on toward the main land until I judged I could fetch by the shoal. I tacked ship and stood off toward the point of the shoal, hoping to go by, but I could not. I tacked ship again, and stood toward the land as near as I dared. I tacked once more; wind blowing a gale, and heavy sea. I reefed the sails, stood off toward point of shoal. Darkness prevailed, and sea growing rougher; gale increasing; every thread of canvas was strained to its utmost tension; sea breaking over us; still on we strained toward the point of shoal. Will she fetch by? If not, we are doomed, for she will never go in stays again. A forlorn hope —our anchors. My young wife was in the cabin asleep. Let her sleep on. Go at last, if we must. I will take her with me, with as little suffering as possible.

Once more a delusive hope prompted me to set more sail, thinking by so doing I might get her again in stays. I ordered two men to go aloft and turn the reef out of the topsail, while I took the wheel. They had got about half way up the rigging when a voice, clear and distinct, at my right shoulder, said: "CALL THEM BACK." I did call them back. They heard my voice above the roar of the wind and rushing waves, and came back.

That final point, "To be, or not to be," was fast approaching. "Five fathoms," called the man at the lead, with lessening depth as the moments passed, "and half five." What! throw again! "Six fathoms!" Great Father! are we passing the shoal? "Seven fathoms!" We must be surely going by. "Eight fathoms," followed by "Nine," and "Ten;" then I knew we had passed the shoal.

Now I come to the sequel of my story, though roughly told, it possesses the diamond quality of truth. Under the lee of that shoal, with shortened sail, we laid off and on until morning. When daylight came we were surprised to find that our mainmast was broken about one-half off by the deck, and held in place by the standing rigging. The foremast was broken at the head, and it also was held up by the standing rigging. Had I set that extra sail, which I surely should have done, had it not been for the warning voice, both masts would have gone by the board. In such contingency, imagination must fill the scene.

My Love and I.

Many years ago, I was a young sea captain. When upon a time a young lady broke into and disturbed the even tenor of my life. She doubled my resolution. She filled the world with beauty, and my soul with joy. We came to be companions of mutual like, until, as in my absence, the steam war-ship Missouri, came visiting along the coast of Maine. My lady friend, with others, went on board to see her. A young midshipman saw my friend, and became charmed with her beauty. Making himself very gracious. When he left, with her consent, a correspondence was opened. She had a lady confidant, to whom she read the letters received from him, and that lady confidant made all known to me; so that evening I said: "Inasmuch as you have another friend, I will go home and stay there until you have decided what you want to do; then if you send for me I will come back."

She seemed greatly surprised, and in parting her tears were flowing. I pitied her. She never sent for me. I never saw her again. That midshipman resigned his position in the navy and married her. In a little over a year she died.

Fifteen years had been added to the forgotten past since her death, when one evening, being in the presence of a trance medium, she held out her hand and called me by name, saying: "I thought I would come and have a little talk with you about that concealed letter."

"Who are you "

She replied, "You were at one time my friend."

"I hope so. What was your name?"

The name of my long since lady love was given. I critically called for the evidence of her identity. She responded without a single failure. Being convinced she was who she claimed to be, I said: "What did you mean by a concealed letter?"

She replied: "I mean the letter you took from my bosom that exposed me."

"Why," I said, "I never took any letter from your bosom."

"You did. You took the letter from my bosom that exposed me."

"I am sure that I never did, for if I had done such a thing I would surely remember it."

Then she said, "I sat on the sofa beside you and dropped to sleep, and you took that letter from my bosom."

"I never did it!"

"Oh, you have forgotten it."

"I very well remember of her sitting beside me on the sofa, and going for a moment to sleep; that is true, but I never took a letter from her bosom, and I never saw one of her letters. She never mistrusted that her confidant had betrayed her, so having but mislaid the letter, she judged that I got it, and through it the information that I seemed to possess, that as she expressed it, exposed her, and that she died so believing, and I suppose she believes it yet.

I have ever regarded this incident as the best evidence of individual Spiritual existence that I have ever received.

To write this story out in full, it would be a romance of rare beauty.

SKEPTICISM AND CRITICISM.

A Seance Held Under Test Conditions.

To the Editor:—Your recent letter, some editorials and the severe criticism and skepticism recently expressed to the writer by friends and half-fledged Spiritualists, prompted us to put our good friend the medium, Mr. James A. Caton, of Parkersburg, West Virginia, under strict test conditions at one of his seances in this city.

Sunday, May 3rd, at 8:30 p. m., in the dining room of Mr. and Mrs Titus M. Welsh, of this city, we were gathered to the number of seventeen besides the medium,

The writer approached the medium while he was pouring water through his trumpets, immediately before sitting down to his work, and addressed him as follows: "Mr. Caton, I assure you of my own sincere confidence in your mediumship and honesty. However, to put at rest the awful skepticism of some people, we ask you if you will consent to go under strict test conditions to-night.

Mr. Caton replied: "I am somewhat astonished at this, as I think you people have known me long enough, yet I will go under test conditions, provided they are not cruel, and with the understanding that after 20 or 30 minutes of such conditions I be freed after everyone has completely satisfied themselves that I have nothing to do with the phenomena except to lend my presence to the circle."

We therefore put one end of six yards of mosquito netting under his chair legs and feet, then sewed his coat-sleeves to his trousers, crossed the hands, and sewed the coat sleeves to each other; sewed his coat shut at his breast; passed the mosquito netting over his head, raised the rear legs of the chair, passed the netting under them, pinned the netting to his clothing on both sides. Two men selected by the circle were commissioned to place the side legs of their chairs over some of the netting on the floor, and to grasp his hands.

The lights were then extinguished, and truly marvelous physical phenomena occurred; in fact, much stronger phenomena than usually occurs at his seances.

His main control, Dr. Sayers, spoke to us as we started to sing, he said, "Good evening, friends! Well, well; Oh, well, it's all right, but I don't like it. Still, I hope it will do good, and that it will convince some of the doubting Thomases. But I want you to release my medium as soon as you are all satisfied."

The medium's usual voices, loud, plain-talking, whispers, and independent voices occurred, all bearing the ear-marks of the individuals they claimed to be, except some of the strange spirits and Indians. Chairs were pulled from under the sitters; the writer and several others were levitated a few inches from their chairs and gently lowered again with no chair under them. The writer and two others saw the four trumpets on the table rise at once when the room was darkened, and saw them vibrating up and down over the table. (There was a little light from one of the windows, about three seats to the right of the medium, which made this possible. The two sitters were changed on each side of the medium every few minutes; 10 to 12 times we lighted matches, as some one or another called out to light up quickly. No one was restricted in this lighting-up business. Once a chair was removed from under a lady, three places removed from the medium, the chair tapped her twice gently on the head, which caused her to shriek, and us to light up at once, but we found her chair on top of the four trumpets on the table under the chandelier, which is suspended three feet above said table. One of the sitters who was sitting at his request for the second time next to the medium, was found under the table and held there until we lighted up. These and many other things occurred in the short 25 to 30 minutes of the test conditions.

We then released the medium, finding all stitches intact. We then continued our regular nice, more civil, and quiet communion with our departed friends for 30 minutes. After that we held a light seance, which was more remarkable, but as I have taken up so much of your space, I will not go into further details.

Friend Francis, there is certainly plenty of genuine phenomena, although as I stated before, less than one-tenth of our present which passes genuine phenomena is fraud, no doubt. On the other hand, there is such real phenomena occurring constantly that are not observed or noticed that it more than offsets the fearful amount of deliberate fraud.

I wish to say that personally I have seen very little fraud or what even seemed to be such. I write the above partly because I have seen no report of late in The Progressive Thinker from this section.

Sincerely yours, R. STARCKE.

I fully endorse the above narrative.

Those will come to whom it will be given to see the elementary machinery at work; who, as it were, from some slight hint of the straws, will feel the winds of March when they do not blow. To them will nothing be trivial, seeing that they will have in their eyes the invisible conflict going on around us, whose features a nod, a smile, a laugh, of ours perpetually changes, and they will perceive, moreover, that in real life all hangs together; the train is laid in the lifting of an eyebrow, that bursts upon the field of thousands. They will see the links of things as they pass, and wonder not, as foolish people now do, that this great matter came out of that small one.—George Meredith.

Proofs of Spirit Return.

An Interesting Chapter of Spiritual Experiences,—and Some Non-Spiritual.

In resuming the statement relative to my experience with the medium, Mrs. Jennie Moore, while at my house, at one seance my son-in-law, Charles McCoy, was present, and a person appeared representing himself as being Ben Cole. McCoy recognized him as being the person that he represented himself to be, and the conversation was principally between those two. McCoy was braking on the C. & N. W., and Cole was braking on the same road until he was killed by the cars. They were well acquainted and it seems that Cole appeared especially for McCoy's benefit.

During their convehsation the matter of Cole's being killed by the cars was referred to by McCoy, who said, "Well, Ben, they got you." Cole said, "Yes, and they will get you."

McCoy laughed and said, "I guess not."

Cole said, "They will, and you remember what I say."

In a little less than fifteen months from that time McCoy was killed by the cars. Who knows but "coming events cast their shadows before."

J. L. Potter, a trance speaker, lived at Wonewoc for fifteen years and more. He did much while there to advance the cause of Spiritualism. Lectured nearly every Sunday night and without remuneration. Before coming to Wonewoc he was state lecturer for Minnesota for a number of years. About two weeks before Mrs. Moore came he died. I say two weeks, but it may not have been more than one. G. H. Brooks may remember the date of the funeral, for he delivered the discourse, and it was exceedingly fine. Potter appeared at two or three seance, and at one, it being Feb. 22, he said to me: "Carter, this is your and my anniversary."

As he spoke it passed through my mind that it was the anniversary of my wedding, and I said yes. As to his anniversary, I didn't understand what he meant. He was married there, but I do not remember the date, but believe it was about that time of the year.

In stating the foregoing facts, I have refrained from calling the various appearances at the aperture of the cabinet spirits. My reason for so doing was to convey the impression that they were people and seemingly as natural as when in the body and here on earth dwelling among their friends and neighbors. The most natural way that I can illustrate what occurred at the various seances is to assume that yourself with a few others are sitting in your house with a window open and one of your neighbor comes along, stops at the window, holds a short conversation with you, then passes on, and very soon another comes along and does likewise; and so on to the end. Nothing strange, superhuman or unnatural about it. All differently dressed, talk, act and look differently and are different people and talk on different subjects. No white dressed persons swathed in gauze or netting, with faces screened, flitting through the crowd with whispers and soft words devoid of sense or meaning.

I have the impression that all persons who are honest in their intentions and have been hoodwinked, deceived or defrauded with pretended materialization, are sick and disgusted whenever they hear the subject mentioned, for I have had a little experience myself, with the tin horn fake, and I never hear the mention of trumpet seance without being sick.

The seance was at my house. A stranger arrived in town who claimed to be a trumpet medium. A friend sent to the house to know if it would be convenient to have a seance there, and was informed that it would. When the time arrived, the man with the tin horn and about eight Spiritualists arrived with him. A tin horn seance is always held in a room that is darker than midnight ever was in Egypt. He got us seated all right to make the conditions in proper shape, so after sitting long enough to have the spirits develop the horn began to be manipulated and there was a kind of muttering within it but the persons sitting nearest the man with the horn got on to the racket and quietly whispered to their next neighbor what was going on, and we concluded we had been convinced, and adjourned. The next day we told him the air at that place was unhealthy, and he concluded it would be safe to resume his journey.

Since that time I have not heard of a trumpet but I have been sick. I was so disgusted I did not learn his name. All were Spiritualists who were present, and we felt so cheap over it that it was kept to ourselves and I think no one else was ever the wiser, for I never heard a word after.

It seems reasonable to me that if a spirit can talk IN a horn it can talk WITHOUT a horn.

About ten years ago my wife and I were at Mrs. Moore's, and she gave us a photograph that she said was taken at a camp meeting at Clinton, Iowa. It included Mrs. Moore, her sister-in-law, an old gentleman and lady, Mrs. Moore's cabinet, and at the aperture Charley Murphy was revealed. Mrs. Moore said she didn't know Murphy was there till the picture was developed and that she was surprised when she saw it. We have the picture now and it is as it was when taken except Murphy is entirely obliterated and where he was is a blurr and not the vestige of a picture there.

A number of years ago Mrs. Moore was prosecuted at Chicago, but what the charges were I never exactly knew. She told me that she proposed to give a seance in the court room, but the judge would not permit her to do so. But she was not convicted, whatever the charge may have been. Mrs. Moore may have been or may be a fraudulent medium, but if so, it is my candid opinion there is not a genuine honest medium on the earth, and if there are none we have been carried far astray and the Devil may get us yet.

I have another experience to relate but it is nothing to do with mediums or seances.

Our little boy that died, whom I have previously stated as having been described to me by two different mediums in connection with a little spotted dog, was less than two years old when he passed away. He was lying in a crib and I was sitting beside the crib. All at once he raised upright on his feet and as he did so I took hold of him to prevent him from falling, he extended his hands in front of him as a child will when a person extends theirs towards them to receive them, and he said, "Pa, let me go—let me go!"

I laid him back in the crib and in less than fifteen minutes he had gone. Had someone come for him, that we could not see? I thought so then—I think so now. That one instance, to me is better proof of the continuity of life than all the trumpet seances in the universe.

One more instance and I have done. I do not vouch for its truthfulness, but I believe it to be true. When I was a boy eight or nine years old, an uncle of my mother was at our house. He was, I think, about sixty-five years old. He related some things that he had seen, which at that time was supposed to be supernatural, but at the present time is considered perfectly natural. Once, he said, just at the edge of the evening he and a companion were riding horseback, and he saw a few rods ahead of them a man and a woman on horseback, and he asked his companion if he could see them, and he said, "No." He thought to overtake them, but when they rode faster, the party ahead did the same, and he could get no nearer, and the same interval was maintained between them for quite a distance. But in a short time the party they were pursuing turned to the fence by the side of the road and disappeared as if they went into the ground.

Another time, just at evening he was walking in the road, and he saw a dog coming. When the dog got opposite to him he thrust out his foot and it went through the dog and it disappeared. He was a carpenter, and in those days coffins were made by carpenters, and he made them when required, and that he could nearly always tell when he would be called upon to make one, for he could hear his saws rattle against the side of the shop. He related other instances, but I do not remember them.

CLINTON, IOWA, CAMP.

In reply to the many calls for programs for the coming session of the above camp, which opens July 26, will say we have been unavoidably delayed in getting them ready for the printers. After the "copy" was all sent in, Mrs. Carpenter and Mrs. Sexsmith cancelled their engagements, and the chairman of committee was forced to look elsewhere for speaker and medium to fill the vacancy.

Am glad to state, however, that we have secured the service of Mrs. Bessie Bellman, of Kansas, as speaker, and Mrs. Laura M. Jones of St. Louis, as message bearer. Both ladies come to us with the best of recommendations. Mrs. Bellman is president of the Kansas State Association, and Mrs. Jones is pastor of the Third Spiritualist Society, which holds regular services in Victoria hall, Easton avenue, St. Louis.

We think we have passed the "limit," and will in a few days be able to mail you one of the neatest, most artistic, as well as one of the strongest programs the M. V. S. A. has sent out in years.

Every day will be a revelation and an inspiration during the meeting. The old custom of a "Rest" day has been cut out, giving a varied and interesting program instead.

Through the effort and kindness of our lovely sister, Mrs. Frankie Cole, a handsome new flag will be presented to the Association, and amidst the strains of sweet music and song "Old Glory" will rise to the top of the staff and float over a new-born meeting of another year.

The music will be exceptionally fine this season, with Mrs. Flora Russell, of Ohio, as vocalist, and Miss Golden as pianist. Prof. Weiss' orchestra will furnish music for dances and entertainments, and will give lawn concerts each Sunday evening. Thus will he produce "one note of the divine concord, which the entire universe is destined one day to sound."

Everything seems to be awakening to new life on the Park. Cottagers are busy painting, and planting tree, shrub and flower in every nook and corner. Several cottages have changed hands, and new-comers are adding zeal to our cause by locating among us.

The Clinton Chautauqua will hold forth at Mt. Pleasant Park again this season, beginning June 19 and holding ten days. They are full of interest and any one attending will surely be intellectually benefited.

In fact, when we stop to consider that three of the greatest statesmen of the present day have spoken from our platform, to say nothing of the giant intellects of our own ranks, we feel that we have much to be proud of—much to appreciate. When we as an organization become fearless and independent enough to dare to do right, and be indifferent to the world's aftermath, and have sufficient nerve to refuse commercialism and can show clean palms to the whole world, then the many officers that command the mighty ship of Spiritualism may launch her fearlessly into the ocean of all religions and reforms, and with the consciousness that the life and honor of no passenger is imperiled, ride with safety every billow that rears its foamy crest in stormy pathway, and leave far behind in her glistening wake a silvery light as a guide for future generations.

Remember, then, this spiritual Chautauqua which is bone and sinew of all that is good, is open to all to come and drink of the waters of life freely. It bids you "wash your lives from selfishness in the clear water of service for others."

A CATHOLIC PRIEST CRITICISES CATHOLIC SCHOOLS.

Father McMahon in His Sermon Finds Fault Especially With Higher Institutions.—Says Political Power of Catholics is Gone.—And There Is Not a Good Catholic Newspaper in English in All the Country.

The Rev. Joseph H. McMahon, rector of the Church of Our Lady of Lourdes, on Washington Heights, in his sermon there yesterday made some remarks unfavorable both to the public schools and to the parochial schools, as well as to the Catholic institutions of higher learning. Father McMahon said:

"The real danger to our children comes not so much from our lower schools as from our high schools. Scientific and historical heresies sufficient to undermine their faith are taught in the common schools of the city. If the theory of general evolution as taught in the public schools is right, then you and I, my friends, are the greatest fools on earth. The text books our Catholic children use in the public schools teach them doctrines that would make our religion a hypocrisy.

"What have we done intellectually in the United States to further the cause of Catholicism? We haven't in the country a good Catholic newspaper printed in English, unless we want a gossip sheet telling us about Father So-and-So and his piety.

Advises Political Coercion.

"We are trying to educate our children in our own way at the Sunday schools, while the directors of the New York public schools are holding meetings in an endeavor to bring back sectarian teachings to their institutions. If we have courage and not fear, we will refuse to allow our children to hear these doctrines. We will go to the city hall and say to the politicians: 'Give us what we want, what our conscience demands, or we will gather the Catholic voters in the city and smash your party; send it to oblivion. But no, we won't do that; we are content to receive sops from the civil government. What brave men we are!

"The power of the Catholic element in New York is gone as far as politics is concerned. We can use our influence to get newspaper stands or bootblack stores, and that is all. Politically Catholics don't count a rap in New York. The Catholic office holders are afraid of being found out if they give us favors. Besides, they are busily engaged in looking after the interests of the rich men.

Church in Duel to the Death.

"I ask why should the young men of the country who contemplate the Catholic priesthood flock to Yale and Harvard and Princeton, while the Catholic seminaries stand half empty? Is it because the schools where the tenets of Catholicism are said to be taught do not fulfill their promise? Are we sure that they stand for all that is good in the Catholic life?

"In this country at this time we are challenged to a duel to the death; the old religious denominations are slowly breaking up; most of the Episcopal churches are on the road to Unitarianism—no Christianity—and on the other Catholicism, which is losing its children by the hundreds of thousands because it makes no provision for education in Catholic principles.

"There is as much self-advertising, as much hypocrisy in our church as outside it. Many believe that anything bearing the label Catholicism is acceptable. I beg humbly to disagree with that view of the matter. Some of our unfortunate brethren who live only in the supplement of the evening papers or in the ten-cent magazines, look with disfavor on the Holy Father's attack of modernism.

"They call the Holy Father the peasant pope, but he has put his finger on the shameful weaknesses of the Catholic clergy. He has pointed out that our greatest danger lies in our ignorance of Catholic ideals and beliefs. Speaking to a deputation of journalists at Rome recently, the Pope said that until an influential Catholic press, aiding the work of the church, could be built up in America our religion cannot expect to lead."

The above startling statements in reference to the Catholic church appears in a late New York World. It conveys an important lesson to the world.

Shall We Abandon the Camp Meetings? No!

While having great respect and friendship for Brother Barrett, I must object to his idea of doing away with the camp meetings, and I want to thank Brother Peck for his able article in defense of the old-time institutions.

Brother Barrett asks: "Would it not be better for Spiritualists, better for the public, better for science, and religion, to abandon camp work and turn the mental, spiritual, and financial energies there expended into other and more helpful channels?"

There is a tendency among many people to argue that nothing can be accomplished worth while except along lines of high grade of thought and action.

There are those who say there should be no music rendered except the classical, and all else should be shut out.

The phonograph may not furnish as fine music as the master players, but how few there are who are able to attend places where they can hear the music first hand.

Is it not better to have music of some kind that the masses are able to hear in their own homes, than to not have any because they can't hear what some few think is only worthy of being heard?

It takes all grades of minds and tastes to make up the whole in the human family, but if one thinks that potatoes are the only food, and another wants some dainty wafer, let them have their choice.

So in regard to spiritual food, we can't all think and work along certain high lines, for we are not able to reach such places.

Thousands of suffering souls have gleaned a grain of comfort from a chance visit to a Spiritualist camp meetings, resulting in the planting of a new idea, a new hope, that would never, probably, have been found in any other way, and destined to grow and widen out from each tiny center.

Shut out the camp meetings and you debar thousands of hungry souls from the chance of getting a start in the new light.

Scarce ever a person attends a camp meeting for the first time that is not pleased and eager to go again.

There is an association and natural pleasure in attending such meetings that is hard to find in any other direction.

Personally, had I never attended a camp meeting I very much doubt if I would ever have become a Spiritualist, for it was at Mt. Pleasant Park, fifteen years ago, that I got my first message and the idea that Spiritualism might be true, and they have been coming ever since, and I bless the dear old Brother H. H. Roberts for being the instrument of my first visit.

Along with my fellow workers I have had it said to me time and again, "Why don't you kick out this or that one; I know them to be frauds?"

As Brother Peck truly says, it was not the fakers that were difficult to deal with; it was the dead easy gullibles we had to hamper us.

I have said many times to these critics, let us look at this matter; we know there are fakers just as you say.

At home you are held in high esteem by your fellow citizens, and what you say would be taken as the truth.

But, for every one who will say that such a person is a faker, I will agree to bring a dozen people just as well thought of at home as you are, who will swear by all they hold sacred that they KNOW them to be genuine mediums. The only way was to educate the gullibles which I am glad to see is now fast being done.

I have seen many times on Mt. Pleasant Park when a person was in danger of physical violence for denouncing a faker and that more especially from the dupes and that same condition has existed not so very many months back either.

One potent cause of trouble in an association of any kind is petty jealousies among the members because some pet plan was not adopted, the sore ones kick over the traces and sulk, and say and do all they can to cripple those who are trying hard to make things a success, instead of putting a shoulder to the wheel and helping push, even if the good old coach is snaked out of the mud on what they think is the wrong side of the road.

A DEFENSE OF MRS. EFFIE MOSS.

A Reply to Hereward Carrington's Article Published in The Progressive Thinker of April 4.

To the Editor: I do not wish to answer Mr. Carrington's entire article, but that portion of it that applies to Mrs. Effie Moss, the well-known materializing medium.

That chapter of Mr. Carrington's article at least, is a mass of misstatements, and contradictions, and I am prepared to prove this statement.

Mr. Carrington says in his article, "I had to obtain a practical recommendation from an old sitter before I was allowed to attend any of the materializing seances held by the three materializing mediums at Lily Dale."

This statement is not true in regard to Mrs. Moss, as she does not require references when at Lily Dale. It is true that she takes a list of the people wishing to attend her seances, because she does not wish to overcrowd her rooms, and frequently she has to refuse to admit people for that reason; no lady or gentleman was ever refused admission, if there was room for them. Mrs. Moss always limits her seances to twenty sitters, unless it is some especial occasion.

Mr. Carrington says that "he did not examine the cabinet, as examinations of this kind are quite useless. * * * Traps can always be cut, so as to escape nasty examination."

The house Mrs. Moss occupied during the month of August was the Moses Hull cottage. Mrs. Moss had never occupied the said cottage previous to that time, and furthermore I would say, that during the eighteen years that she has attended the camp, she has never occupied the same cottage twice. I make this point to show how absurd the trap door theory is.

Mr. Carrington further says: "So long as phenomena of this sort are produced in the medium's own house, it is almost impossible to circumvent trickery, and it is useless to attempt it."

I could go on and enumerate many seances held in different parts of the country, in private homes, as well as in public halls; but space will not permit me to do so.

Mr. Carrington further states, "Medium and manager both stood close to the door by the cabinet preparatory to extinguishing the lamp; this was suddenly blown out, and then came a hunt for a table on which to stand it." The facts of the case are that the lamp was placed in parlor back of the circle, but the seance light was burning during this time, so that those in the circle were enabled to see what was transpiring. "The medium and manager passed in and out of the door several times, completely darkening, and blocking the curtains." This statement was false as there were no curtains over the door in question.

Mr. Carrington says that he was convinced that a young girl slipped into the cabinet; if such was the case, or if he had such convictions, why did he not say so at the time?

He would have been given every opportunity to examine the cabinet or the entire house of he so desired.

Mr. Carrington also makes false statements about Mrs. Moss, as to the language she used on that occasion, also makes comments about her being "a fat woman." I would ask the reader if a gentleman would make comments about a lady's personal appearance?

Again referring to Mr. Carrington's article. He says:

"A woman sitting next the door at C taking an active part in all the songs. She was, I am convinced, a confederate."

Mr. Carrington appears to be full of convictions—without any facts to bear out his so-called convictions. The lady in question is well-known in the Spiritualist Society in Dayton, Ohio, and her character is beyond question.

Mr. Carrington says that Mrs. Moss held seances on alternate nights with Mr. Johnson, of Toledo, whereas the truth of this statement can be easily disproved, as it was a well known fact that Mrs. Moss held seances every night during Mr. Johnson's visit to the camp, Mr. Johnson holding seances on the same evenings. I can verify this statement by many people who attended camp.

Carrington also says that the forms were all clothed alike; this statement is also false, as the many people who attend Mrs. Moss' seances can attest.

I would ask Mr. Carrington how he knew that they were all robed alike if it was so intensely dark that he coud not see?

Another suspicious fact to this man of convictions was that the manager stood close to him when he was at the cabinet.

Now considering the fact that the circle was seated completely around the room, commencing at the cabinet at one end and ending at the cabinet at the other end, it would be rather difficult for the manager to stand anywhere else, as he is not yet capable of dematerializing.

Mr. Carrington says that he "had given his word not to grab."

I would ask him, to whom did he give his word? It was certainly not to the medium or her manager.

Mr. Carrington admits that most of the sitters were convinced of the identity of the spirits; all were not equally satisfied. He mentions two brothers and two sisters went to the cabinet while their mother materialized. I beg leave to correct this statement. The gentlemen in question were two brothers, the ladies in question were their wives, the spirit that manifested was the gentlemen's mother.

The gentlemen referred to were Dr. King, of Toronto, president of the Psychical Research Society, and his brother, of Hamilton, Ont. The gentlemen have investigated the phenomena for some years; the ladies had but just commenced their investigation.

Mr. Carrington states that at the close of the seance he was not permitted to enter, look into, or even approach the cabinet, "but I got near enough to hear smothered whisperings inside; the spirits were evidently inside the cabinet talking with the medium."

What balderdash!

People who are accustomed to attending Mrs. Moss' seances know that at the close of every seance, her friends go up to the cabinet and talk to the medium; in fact she holds quite a reception at the close of each seance.

If Mr. Carrington wished to examine the cabinet at the close he should have spoken to the manager, and he would have been given every opportunity to examine the cabinet or the entire house.

At the conclusion of Carrington's article he states that he received a letter stating that "Dr. ——, I don't remember his name, went to the Moss seance and seized the medium masquerading as a child. Oh! the shame of it. He was promptly given back his money and put out of the house." This statement is absolutely false from beginning to end.

No one grabbed Mrs. Moss or a spirit, and no one was ejected from the house during the entire season.

It is ridiculous to say that Mrs. Moss was masquerading as a little child—a woman weighing over two hundred pounds would not be capable of doing anything of the kind, and allowing this statement to be true, it would demonstrate the falsity of Carrington's statement that Mrs. Moss employed a young girl to do the juvenile parts in the seance.

Carrington concludes his account with the statement "that Spiritualists at camp meetings of this character do not want the truth."

Such an assertion is an insult to every Spiritualist, and to every reader of this paper.

Spiritualists want the truth, and nothing but the truth. But they reserve the right to think for themselves, and to use the God-given judgment that we all possess.

In relating his experience with another medium, Carrington says, "Which shows that Spiritualists do not lack a sense of humor at times."

That is certainly the most humorous thing he has written. He evidently regard Spiritualists as almost human, for they are not entirely devoid of humor—at times.

The audacity of this man Carrington is amusing.

THE MORRIS PRATT INSTITUTE.

Sixth Annual Meeting of the Association, and Commencement Exercises—Good Work.

I am glad I attended this meeting, not for the reason that I was placed in office, but for many reasons. In the first place, I believe in education, and I know nowhere is it more needed than in the ranks of the field-workers of Spiritualism. For many, many years the work has been carried on, often, and mayhaps always, under the spirit direction, regardless of the mental capacity of the instrument through which the work was being done. Often this was a great disadvantage to the spirit guides.

True, the physical phenomena may not require a collegiate education in its manifestations, but there are other phases to be considered, perhaps no higher, but more upon the mental plane, and which must necessarily be presented more publicly, and often before large and critical audiences.

Who can deny that orthodoxy gained more rapidly and more firmly a hold upon the thinking, the educated, and more spiritually inclined people, after establishing theological schools and educating their instruments of inspiration, and presenting their ideas in a more highly cultured manner?

The phenomena may be the foundation, and need not so much mental training, in fact, may be given the untutored, but the Spiritualism of to-day must needs be understood, must needs be studied, to be intelligently presented and received for what it is worth.

People of culture are investigating and it is well to be prepared to present the philosophy, the explanation of the phenomena, and the ethical and religious side of Spiritualism, in the clearest, mast eloquent and most scholarly manner possible, and add more strength of character to the movement, give it a new impetus and raise the standard of its esteem by the general public.

If Spiritualists would stop digging up the records of others and dig up a little of their own, of the past and even the present; if they would stop hunting slime of the past with which to besmirch the good name of the present, they would surely accomplish more real good for the Cause, and raise themselves in the estimation of the world. There is too much time spent in picking flaws in the Morris Pratt Institute, and not enough in giving it the support due an educational institution.

It must be apparent to every true and right-thinking Spiritualist that a truth worth presenting is worth presenting well.

It is plainly evident now that the more beautifully and scholarly our philosophy and religion are presented the higher the grade of thinkers will we attract to us.

The phenomena are all right, when genuine, (when not genuine they are not phenomena), but why cluster around the phenomena and hold our loved ones to the earth plane, and postpone their progress by our continuous presence at the seance? The seances are all right for the investigator to get his eyes opened to the proof of a continued existence beyond the mortal confines, and, too, a good place for an occasional visit with our arisen loved ones; but why not lift ourselves toward their sphere, and elevate them and ourselves too, by study; by brightening our intellect, and making ourselves easier of access; polishing and beautifying ourselves as channels of inspiration, by reading and absorbing the grand literature of all inspired writers and thinkers?

Now, to the point at issue in a business way:

My dear Brother Spiritualist, with sufficient means, and with a son or daughter, or both, who have a good common-school education and aspiration for the spiritual work (with or without some kind of mediumistic gift)—not for the money they can make out of it, but for the advancement of the Cause of truth—you cannot do more for Spiritualism than to start them through the Morris Pratt School, and keep them there at least three years.

Now do not listen to the tirade of abuse you may hear from the brain (or vacuum) of prejudice. You know the real value of education in all departments of life—in law, in medicine, in music, in mercantile lines and all others—why not, while you are in the form and with your children, with the full right and privilege of the use of your own accumulated means, utilize it yourself according to your impressions, instead of waiting until your transition, only to watch it misappropriated from the use to which you prefer it should go?

Go to the Institute yourself; talk with the faculty; talk with the students; consult your own conscience, and determine upon your plans and carry them out now. A will is so easily broken (so long as the world considers a belief in spirit return to be a mark of "mental aberration,") in the hands of spiritually disinterested heirs. DO IT NOW.

Again do I feel like appealing to every State organization to collect and establish a fund and send some poor aspiring and worthy boy or girl each year to this institution, and in heaven's name do not think of establishing another similar institution until this is found inadequate to the demand, and even then it were better to enlarge the capacity of this one.

The question often comes, "What can we do with these graduates, with our weak societies?"

Why, bless your soul, don't you know that a cultured speaker and medium will raise the standard of excellence upon the rostrum and demand and obtain a better and larger following? Necessity is now making a demand for higher education in our ranks, and we must either supply that demand or let it go to the churches. Which will you do?

The building needs repairs, and it the Institution needs endowments, and the endowments should not be confined to, nor expected to be from Wisconsin, but from every state in the Union. This is a National Spiritualists' Institution and must so be considered, and is of as much importance to one State Association and to one individual Spiritualist as to another, and all who approve of the education in any channel must also approve of the education of our platform workers.

How much more attractive to an educated public are even the messages given in polished language. Platform mediums would be greatly benefited by a course in this college.

Now, good brothers and sisters, when you send in your donations of $100, $75, $50, $25 or even less, to the Illinois State Spiritualists' Association, to Miss Eugenia Roubie, secretary; to the N. S. A., or direct to the M. P. I., Whitewater, Wis., please mention The Progressive Thinker, in which you receive your suggestion, whether from this or a former or a future article therein contained.

THE PSYCHOGRAPH
OR
Dial Planchette.

This instrument is substantially the same as that employed by Prof. Hare in his early investigations. In its improved form it has been before the public for more than twelve years, and in the hands of thousands of persons has proved its superiority over the Planchette, and all other instruments which have been brought out in imitation, both in regard to certainty and correctness of the communications received by its aid, and as a means of developing mediumship.

Do you wish to investigate Spiritualism?
Do you wish to develop Mediumship?
Do you desire to receive communications?

The Psychograph is an invaluable assistant. A pamphlet with full directions for the FORMATION OF CIRCLES AND CULTIVATION OF MEDIUMSHIP with every instrument. Many who were not aware of their mediumistic gift, have, after a few sittings, been able to receive delightful messages. A volume might be filled with commendatory letters. Many who began with it as an amusing toy, found that the intelligence controlling it knew more than themselves, and became converts to Spiritualism.

Capt D. B. Edwards, Orient, N. Y., writes: "I had communications (by the Psychograph) from many other friends, even from old settlers whose gravestones are moss-grown in the old yard. They have been highly satisfactory, and proved to me that Spiritualism is indeed true, and the communications have given my heart the greatest comfort in the severest loss I have had of son, daughter, and their mother."

Dr. Eugene Crowell, whose writings have made his name familiar to those interested in psychic matters, writes as follows: "I am much pleased with the Psychograph. It is very simple in principle and construction, and I am sure must be far more sensitive to spiritual power than the one now in use. I believe it will generally supersede the latter when its superior merits become known."

An Old-Time Worker.

It is with great pleasure that we publish below an Address by the Hon. A. B. French, known in former years as the "Silver Tongued Orator of Spiritualism."

BRILLIANT ADDRESS OF WELCOME.

By Hon. A. B. French at the Eighty-sixth Birthday Anniversary of Dr. J. M. Peebles, at Clyde, Ohio.—The Doctor's Feeling Response.

My Friends: I am supremely happy to-night. It is always a pleasure to meet my friends and neighbors. To have added to this presence our guest, Dr. Peebles, whom I have known and admired through more than four decades of vanished years, makes this, indeed, one of life's luminous hours.

Listening to these letters from absent friends, so full of tenderness, and the voice of the song breathing in aeolian sweetness the spirit of this occasion, I feel myself lifted to a Pisgah summit, far above the "din and jar " of mortal strife, where the divine in the human shines out like a brilliant star.

Eighty and six years! Looking forward—how long; going back on the swift wings of memory—how short!

What is time? We watch the rising and setting sun, the ever-changing moon, and the changeless stars driving their blazing chariots around the blue dome above us, and the seasons as they come and go, and we say, "this is time." But is is simply motion—and what is motion but the pulsebeats of the infinite heart. The great poet has truly said: "We live in deeds, not years, in thoughts, not breaths. We should count time by heart-throbs, not fingers on a dial. He lives most who thinks most, acts the noblest and the best."

Measured by this high standard, what a wonderful life our friend's has been! Every life must touch sun and shade, joy and sorrow, hope and despair, and at last lie down in the lap of death, to awaken in the morning of a new day. Behind birth an unmapped ocean beats the shore no mortal feet have touched, and beyond death's willow-fringed harbor lies a country surpassing every earthly dream.

Our friend's life has been so fortunate. I can only offer my feeble congratulations with his unnumbered friends to-night.

He was born at the right place and in the right time. We are just beginning to learn that man's early environment has much to do with his subsequent life. It was fortunate for him that he came to this world with the red blood of the Scotch pioneer coursing in his veins. Great lives are rarely born on beds of damask, nor are their infant lips fed with golden spoons. I may be partial to New England, but if I were to choose a place of birth, I would select the foot of the Green Mountains where our pilgrim friend was born.

Nature speaks to the plastic soul of the child with myriad voices. She speaks in the wandering winds, in the ripple of the clear streams, in the song of the happy birds and draws pictures in wood, tree, flowers, and soft light of the evening stars, never to be effaced from memory. No one has yet told us what the wooded cliffs of the Avon did for Shakespeare, or how much the heather-covered hills and banks of Ayr did for the songs of Burns. No doubt nature did much for our friend in child life. The Green Mountains and the distant Adirondacks, clad in the white robes of winter, or bathed in the mellow rays of summer's sun—the waters of Lake George and Champlain—the mountain streams, singing birds, and sighing winds wove subtle threads in child-life, and whispered freedom to his soul the coming years could not efface.

I congratulate him to-night upon the time of his coming. I believe with the wise king of Israel, there is a time to be born. There are times when great mental revolutions, like the mighty swells of the uplifting sea, are gathering; times when long-anchored thought breaks from its moorings and proudly rises on a crest of freedom. At such periods you can no more check the forces gathered than you can cork the mouth of a volcano or whip an earthquake into silence.

The closing years of the first quarter of the nineteenth century witnessed this condition. It was a period of intense unrest. Religion was about to break the bonds of Calvinism. The government must break the chains of slavery. In New England the spirit of the Pilgrim Fathers beat in the hearts of the sons. Poets are prophets—so sensitive they gauge the coming storm, as the meteorologist feels the oncoming tempest through the hollow air.

He was yet in life's early morning when Whittier and Longfellow,—and across the ocean, Gerald Massey,—were singing the songs of freedom; William Lloyd Garrison and Wendell Phillips began to speak and write. The conflict between democracy and aristocracy was gathering. Religious ideas were also being stirred. Old creeds must be modified and new ones written. Calvinism was as cold as an Arctic ocean, and its God as inhuman as Nero. Beecher had begun his eloquent sermons for human libery. In Boston Theodore Parker proclaimed in beautiful sermon and prayer, a simple and sublime Theism, which sees high over all creeds and lesser gods the one Eternal Father as the Source of all Light, Life and Love.

Our guest was born for public life. The stars decreed on the day of his birth that he should be a preacher. In fact, I am quite certain that there was a council of stars on this occasion. Some first commanded him to preach; and Mercury, the swift-winged messenger of the gods, said he would write; while Herschel, the slow and strange giant of the skies, closed the interview by saying that they could do what they pleased with him in early life, but that he would make him a traveler in later years. He began preaching in early life. So generous was his heart, he chose the most humane creed of all, and began to preach Universalism as taught by the cultured Chapin.

But this work must soon change. There were other signs in the skies and sounds in the air. Young Science had cast aside its infant clothes and grown into a giant, measuring arms with theology on the intellectual stage. This Samson of intellectual strength tore down many a theological castle as easily as David slew Goliath. Herbert Spencer announced the law of evolution and rhythm of motion. Darwin began his search, with keen, intellectual headlight, in a museum of monkeys, baboons and chimpanzees, to find the origin of man. Geologists were beating rocks for fossils of the long dead ages. Chemists in their laboratories were driving matter on rollers of fire from solids to gases, as children play with toys. Astronomers turned the eyes of the telescope up into the blue heavens, watching the gorgeous pageantry of the stars as they marched forever around their central suns. Physiologists, with whetted blades of polished steel, cut away muscles, nerves, arteries and into the gray matter encased in human skulls.

But science nowhere found a conscious, human soul. The hour was ominous. Rachels were weeping for children Death's cold hand had touched—weeping love was calling, but no sound came back from death's deserted halls. Science could not find a human soul.

In this fearful silence, when doubt and hope sat under a weeping cloud in life's lone Gethsemane, sounds were heard in Hydesville, New York. They were not terrific like thunder-peals or rumbling earthquakes, but gentle as the cooing of a dove or the soft patter of raindrops on the parched roof that covers a sleeping child. From beyond the hollow empire of death voices had fallen at last into love's sensitive ear as sweetly as moonbeams fall upon the crystal lips of a glassy lake.

Our friend listened to these sounds, and a new world opened before him. He had preached faith and a free salvation; now, like Saul on the way to Damascus, a voice had called him. He soon found himself immerged by the great psychical wave sweeping over the arid desert of materialism.

He has proclaimed the new gospel with tongue and pen for more than half a century, and five times girdled the globe. Of those who labored with him in the first decades of this movement, nearly all have crossed the divide. Only Andrew Jackson Davis, the Swedenborg of the nineteenth century, and a few remain. Edmonds, Talmage, Tiffany, Hallock, Denton, the eloquent Brittan, with classical pen, and Finney, with his tongue of fire, have been transferred to the public of the skies:

Eighty and six years! What a wealth of experience he has gained! One can not travel the wide world over, as he has traveled it, without learning great truths narrow minds can not conceive. Humboldt was a great traveler. He loved the physical world and traveled much to investigate its surface. After he had viewed rivers, mountains and seen and climbed Chimborazo till the blood oozed from his lips and gums, he found the Cosmos. He learned that the Rhine, Po, Danube, Mississippi, and Amazon were so many great arteries through one world. The mountains and volcanoes were one—this physical world one great body.

So I apprehend our friend, the doctor, has found humanity is one. He has had his enemies, inspired by envy. What moral hero, what reformer has not? Such traducers, like shapeless clouds and driftwood, soon sink away into the maelstrom of forgetfulness. The mother nursing her babes clad in furs, in cold Kamchatka, the wretched beings in desolate Borneo, the beggar in his rags, the millionaire in his palace are, after all, one humanity, touched by the same loves, fired by the same hopes, traveling to the same grave—hoping, praying, for the same heaven.

He has also, no doubt, learned that the world's religions are one at their core. The Indian's great Spirit, the Christian's Jehovah, or God, the Hindu's Brahm, and the wandering Bedouin, the hoofs of whose flying steed beat the desert sands, and who prays to Allah,—are calling different names to express the over-arching Intelligence which girds us 'round about, and in whom we live and have being.

Eighty and six years! What mighty changes! When he was born Queen Victoria was a child of only three years, playing in the home of the Hanovers in England. He has lived through her long reign—(one of the noblest queens God ever gave to an empire. Indeed, she was more than queen; she was a woman, with a woman's heart.)

Less than twelve months before our friend's birth, the old Napoleon died in the paroxysms of a storm at Helena. When he was born our great nation was young, and Ohio a new state in the Federal Union. The great West was almost unknown. Where stood the Indian's wigwam, there great cities have shot up like a star.

He was a boy of more than four years when Jackson was first elected president, and the old hero went to the chair with a broken heart, by the death of the lovely wife he buried at the Hermitage. When he was born, Samuel Morse was painting his portrait of Lafayette, in New York, and he had reached early manhood when Morse had perfected the telegraph and won the thanks of the nation. When he was born, the nations had no steam railroads, and steamships were in their infancy. He has lived to five times girdle the earth in steamers, and is as much at home upon the ocean's breast as a child in the arms of a loving mother.

Telegraph systems, telephones, graphophones, railroads, horseless carriages and air-ships are all the creatures of his day. He is with us now in the opening of the electrical age. What prophet can tell us what marvel this new wizard of earth, air and sky, shall perform? Are we not already stealing the secrets of the universe? And shall not man soon wave the magical wand of universal empire, causing wild and terrific nature to bow at his feet?

Eighty and six years! And still our friend is not old. Victor Hugo once said: "The snow of winter is upon my head, but the eternal spring-time is in my heart." Alpine travelers tell us that the purest mountain streams course beneath the snow-clad Alps and thread their way far underneath the mountain avalanche. Gray hairs are the stainless down angels drop on the storm-beaten heads of life's heroes. The wrinkles on the faces of pilgrims are furrows, when the heart is all too small to contain the tide swell of its emotion. Love, hope and joy never grow old.

Brother Peebles, my voice grows tremulous when I turn to you for this closing word. The memory of forty years' friendship rebukes my weakness. You are in the house of your friends to-night. These tender letters are all for you. This sweet voice of song is for you. These flowers are all yours, and love's tender hand has gathered them for you. If it were in our power, we would give you to-night a flower for every thorn your tired feet may have pressed on life's dusty journey. If we could, we would transform every sigh your weary heart may have drawn into a singing seraph chanting for you, in the illumined bowers of Eden, a song of praise. Could we do it, all the tears your swollen eyes may have wept, would now be made a sunkissed sea of joy. Go on, brave pilgrim, up century's summit! May each to-morrow grow brighter still, and when your feet shall cross the divide out into the land of unending to-morrows, may each one grow brighter and fairer, as the eternal ages let fall their golden sands around you.

"It will be remembered by you, fellow-citizens of Clyde, that mine host was a number of years ago styled at Lily Dale "the silver-tongued orator,' and listening to his thrillingly eloquent address just now, we can only say—the silver-tongued of the past has been transmuted into the golden mouthed of the present."—J. M. P.

Doctor Peebles' Feeling Response.

"I now call upon Dr. Peebles," said the president, Mrs. French.

The doctor rising and casting his eyes over the audience, at the letters just read, and at Mr. French, who had quietly taken his seat, said:

I can not give an address of response. I am overpowered with emotion. Your surprise was complete. The secret was well kept. I did not know that your president, so ably filling the position this evening, had written to one of my friends.

No, I can not talk this evening; my lips are half paralyzed; my brain is whirling in gratitude. I will write out in the future what I would like to say now while the spell of good will is upon you.

This occasion is somewhat embarrassing because looking back over the long pathway of the past I feel that I have only done my duty in whitening harvest fields of reforms.

Eighty-six, and what of it! Often I feel like a gaysome youth of sixteen. The inmost spirit never grows old. Age does not hinge upon dates or years. Active, aged persons have not outgrown their usefulness. Their white hairs are inspirations to others. Though not feeling to shrink any duty I would rather be eighty-six than seventy-six, or sixty-six.

One sweetly solemn thought comes to me o'er and o'er,
I'm nearer my spirit home to-day than e'er I was before.

All should grow gracefully, ripening like the apple, which, ruddy in the sunshine and morning dew, drops at last into the fruit-gatherer's basket. And so the sunset of life should be more beautiful than its sunrise. Youth, like opening buds, has its work in front of it, while old age, with its stint well done, ready to go when the summons comes, has a quiet charm of its own, a calm richness as of autumnal forests, a serene sanctity like that of a moss-embowered cathedral, and the dignity of the towering oak that reeling, tottering in passing gales and storms, stands—still stands an inviting, shady retreat for grazing herds and foot-weary travelers.

Old age is a quiet letting-go—fame, riches, fashions fading, the great, living, pulsing world of spirit seems coming closer, dearer, and more beautiful. The individual is overshadowed by the cosmopolitan. Family lives widen into social, national and international brotherhood, becoming as universal as God's sunshine. He rewards enemies by forgetting them, and searches diligently for the good everywhere, desiring to leave the world more beautiful than he found it. This is a universe of order. God reigns, and ultimately, in ways oft mysterious to us, the good triumphs, transforming the thorns that pierce into white roses, which blooming send their fragrance down through the intermingling races into the far-off ages.

In these travels among the evergreen isles of the Pacific—travels in and through many so-called heathen lands, as well as the most enlightened, during these five voyages around the world, I have witnessed more sea-calms than storms, have beheld more shimmering sunbeams than dark shadows, have seen vastly more smiles than tears, and have heard thousands of merry peals of laughter ringing out from both peasant's hut and the king's palace for a single groan of agony. Surely, God is good, and so optimistic and so afire with faith am I that I travel on trustingly toward that upper city of immortality which hath substantial foundations, and, as an ancient apostle said, "whose builder and maker is God."

Though now an octogenarian and more, life was never so sweet and golden. I look back over the long journey, tangle-footed at times, without a sigh or a tear; nor do I say pessimistically, "It might have been." God and his ministering angels ever know best. "Not my will," exclaimed the Martyr and thorn-crowned Man of Nazareth, "but thy will, O God! be done." I can not in justice to my feelings abstain from quoting the beautiful words of my personal friend, the good, gray American poet, Walt Whitman. I met him for the last time previous to his departure from earth in Camden, N. J. To have heard him read his "Leaves of Grass" was, of itself, worth a short life-time.

All seems beautiful to me
I can repeat over to men and women, You have done such good to me I would do the seame to you,
I will recruit for myself and you as I go,
I will scatter myself among men and women as I go,
I will toss a new gladness and roughness among them,
Whoever denies me it shall not trouble me,
Whoever accepts me, he or she shall be blessed, and shall bless me.

Eighty-six years have I dwelt in this fleshly tabernacle. It has served me well because I built and am still building it up with care. The body does not build the spirit, but the Ego.

The conscious spirit builds the body and clothes it. The spirit of the mortal organism is a semi-detached portion of the Infinite Spirit. In consonance with the Divine Will I incarnated, and twelve times since have I re-incarnated. In this sense re-incarnation, perpetual re-incarnation, is true. Remove a finger nail and in sixteen weeks you have a new one. The soft, fleshy portions of the organization cells, muscles, nerves, ligaments change through excretions in from three months to three years, and the bones in from three to seven years—change, CHANGE, and yet I, the real, inmost man, persists—consciously persists and re-incarnates. Accordingly, I am not the man in manifestation that I was twenty-one years ago, fourteen years ago, or even seven years ago. The past was and is gone. Let it go—bury it from the memory—forget it. No one can make a past fallen hair black or white.

Each event filled its place in time's temple. None are perfect. The wisest make mistakes. The world's worst have their good traits; and down in the soul's subterranean depths all are alike—all are equally pure. To this end the clear-seeing illustrious, Andrew Jackson Davis, the father of modern Spiritualism, wisely said when in his superior state: "The foundational character of every one is innately divine and forever beautiful. It is God-like because it is an INDIVIDUAL DETACHMENT of the Monotheist principle, the Great Positive Mind. It is pure and immaculate, the same in essence as in confirmation."

Though on the eighty-seventh racetrack, marked by mile-posts toward the century, I have an immense amount of work laid out before me. As a free man, I speak the downright truth in my lectures and books, as I understand it, and I care not a pauper's penny whether praised or blamed.

I am too busy to think about death, and there is too much fuss made about dying. It is nature's process of laying down a fleshly burden, and of the rising of the spiritual into the brightness and beatitudes of immortality. Pamper not the curious with a gazing, shrinking at the corpse's face that so recently beamed in love and sweetness. Burning is preferable to burying the forsaken tenement. If not burned, then move on to the cemetery in lively moving carriages, realizing that it is the last kind act toward a deserted shell. Mourning garments, useless and often expensive, are but sombre mementoes of the Dark Ages. Black, with its aural emanations, is repellant to the lovely home-imagery of angelic life. The dying often smile, but never weep. Put flowers on the door knob, and garland the cold form with lilies and wreaths of rose-buds.

I have no conception of "tottering" down the decline of life. The phrase is beyond my comprehension. I expect to work on the very morning of my departure, and sleep into the better land of immortality at the sunset of the same evening. I feel as though I had just begun to live—to see, to comprehend. Heights rise above me, and I am conscious of the mighty immensities lying beyond. Sometimes, for the moment, a sad thought comes to me when I think that I have outlived so many of my esteemed contemporaries—Fishbough, Brittan, Denton, Kiddle, J. O. Barrett, Elder Giles B. Avery, Elder Frederick W. Evans, A. E. Newton, J. H. Harter, Damon Y. Kilgore, J. Rodes Buchanan, Joel Tiffany, Giles B. Stebbins, S. J. Finney, Judge Edmonds, Robert Dale Owen, E. V. Wilson, E. S. Wheeler, Emma H. Britten, Adin Ballou, Abram Smith, Luther Colby, William White, James Burns, S. C. Hall, William Howitt, Benjamin Coleman, Stainton Moses, and other regal-souled toilers on both sides of the Atlantic and across the Pacific waters for human good—toilers upon whose foreheads the immortals wrote, ere their transition, the words, "Faithful—true and faithful!"

The glorious company of the apostles honor them!
The goodly fellowship of the prophets honor them!
The noble army of martyrs honor them!
The mighty hosts of heavenly spirits honor them—
for their work's sake.

Increasing years bring to me no limitation, but rather expansion in the line of increasing reform labor. What I do not finish here I shall accomplish in the next stage of existence through sensitives and willing intermediaries.

This is God's world, rainbowed with promise. Come light or darkness, I don't worry. The wild animals that howl purify the air, and the rains that rust the wheat, revive the grass. Often misunderstood, sometimes misrepresented, frequently walking on thorn-piercing pavements, I stopped not by the wayside to bemoan the rough pathway, but traveled on, inspired by faith within and warmed by the shining sun above me. I never witnessed a starless night. If clouds shut away the glimmerings of the stars from my vision, I knew that they were still above, shining, and that the radiance of morning light would come.

Once I sorrowed that the golden day was dead,
Its light no more the countryside adorning;
But, whilst I grieved, behold! the East grew red
With morning.

Thanking my friends for their kind and loving congratulations and thinking of the morning—the morning-time of immortality, I trust to be pardoned if wrong for inserting the following poems, the first one being so admired by the sainted mother of Mrs. French.

THUGS MAKE VICTIM DISROBE.

Finding Only $35 and Watch, While Expecting More, They Beat Him Unconscious.

"Because he only had $35 and a silver watch in his pockets, two robbers early to-day beat Andrew Harte into insensibility. Thinking he had more money, the robbers compelled Harte to disrobe. Their search failing, they again beat him and fled.

"Harte lay in the alley near Polk and Sherman streets for several hours before he was discovered by the Harrison street police.

"He said he had recently come from Hungary, and that the money taken from him was all the money he had in the world. The police will attempt to find his friends."

Here we have a most remarkable case that occurred in this city, one that is heart-rending in every particular. These two robbers were without a single vestige of human sympathy in their nature. Finding that their victim had only $35 in his possession, they became incensed thereat and beat him into a condition of insensibility.

They doubtless have received the designation of being human beings. If so, then they are degenerates of the worst kind imaginable. Bereft of all human feelings, what is in store for them in the future? Are the entitled to immortality? Yes, perhaps, if they should reform, but being degenerates they will, when they shall have reached the spirit world, find themselves in partial, if not in total darkness. There, without the least light in their souls, they will gradually, no doubt, descend in their depravity, and at last their spirit be disintegrated, returning to the several natural provinces, as set forth by Charles Dawbarn, the California philosopher, from which they were derived.

As to absolute immortality, no one as yet has lived long enough to demonstrate it. It is a question that the wisest angel has not been able to decide; yet there are those on the spirit side of life whose wisdom cannot be questioned, who say that immortality, or a continued existence is only bestowed upon those who are entitled to it. Those who have no light in their souls will be finally blotted out of existence.

It is a mistaken idea that immortality is enforced on any living creature. If you finally gain it, YOU WILL HAVE TO EARN IT. H. S.

An Old-Time Worker.

It is with great pleasure that we publish below an Address by the Hon. A. B. French, known in former years as the "Silver Tongued Orator of Spiritualism."

BRILLIANT ADDRESS OF WELCOME.

By Hon. A. B. French at the Eighty-sixth Birthday Anniversary of Dr. J. M. Peebles, at Clyde, Ohio.—The Doctor's Feeling Response.

My Friends: I am supremely happy to-night. It is always a pleasure to meet my friends and neighbors. To have added to this presence our guest, Dr. Peebles, whom I have known and admired through more than four decades of vanished years, makes this, indeed, one of life's luminous hours.

Listening to these letters from absent friends, so full of tenderness, and the voice of the song breathing in aeolian sweetness the spirit of this occasion, I feel myself lifted to a Pisgah summit, far above the "din and jar" of mortal strife, where the divine in the human shines out like a brilliant star.

Eighty and six years! Looking forward—how long; going back on the swift wings of memory—how short!

What is time? We watch the rising and setting sun, the ever-changing moon, and the changeless stars driving their blazing chariots around the blue dome above us, and the seasons as they come and go, and we say, "this is time." But is is simply motion—and what is motion but the pulsebeats of the infinite heart. The great poet has truly said: "We live in deeds, not years, in thoughts, not breaths. We should count time by heart-throbs, not fingers on a dial. He lives most who thinks most, acts the noblest and the best."

Measured by this high standard, what a wonderful life our friend's has been! Every life must touch sun and shade, joy and sorrow, hope and despair, and at last lie down in the lap of death, to awaken in the morning of a new day. Behind birth an unmapped ocean beats the shore no mortal feet have touched, and beyond death's willow-fringed harbor lies a country surpassing every earthly dream.

Our friend's life has been so fortunate. I can only offer my feeble congratulations with his unnumbered friends to-night.

He was born at the right place and in the right time. We are just beginning to learn that man's early environment has much to do with his subsequent life. It was fortunate for him that he came to this world with the red blood of the Scotch pioneer coursing in his veins. Great lives are rarely born on beds of damask, nor are their infant lips fed with golden spoons. I may be partial to New England, but if I were to choose a place of birth, I would select the foot of the Green Mountains where our pilgrim friend was born.

Nature speaks to the plastic soul of the child with myriad voices. She speaks in the wandering winds, in the ripple of the clear streams, in the song of the happy birds and draws pictures in wood, tree, flowers, and soft light of the evening stars, never to be effaced from memory. No one has yet told us what the wooded cliffs of the Avon did for Shakespeare, or how much the heather-covered hills and banks of Ayr did for the songs of Burns. No doubt nature did much for our friend in child life. The Green Mountains and the distant Adirondacks, clad in the white robes of winter, or bathed in the mellow rays of summer's sun—the waters of Lake George and Champlain—the mountain streams, singing birds, and sighing winds wove subtle threads in child-life, and whispered freedom to his soul the coming years could not efface.

I congratulate him to-night upon the time of his coming. I believe with the wise king of Israel, there is a time to be born. There are times when great mental revolutions, like the mighty swells of the uplifting sea, are gathering; times when long-anchored thought breaks from its moorings and proudly rises on a crest of freedom. At such periods you can no more check the forces gathered than you can cork the mouth of a volcano or whip an earthquake into silence.

The closing years of the first quarter of the nineteenth century witnessed this condition. It was a period of intense unrest. Religion was about to break the bonds of Calvinism. The government must break the chains of slavery. In New England the spirit of the Pilgrim Fathers beat in the hearts of the sons. Poets are prophets—so sensitive they gauge the coming storm, as the meteorologist feels the oncoming tempest through the hollow air.

He was yet in life's early morning when Whittier and Longfellow,—and across the ocean, Gerald Massey,—were singing the songs of freedom; William Lloyd Garrison and Wendell Phillips began to speak and write. The conflict between democracy and aristocracy was gathering. Religious ideas were also being stirred. Old creeds must be modified and new ones written. Calvinism was as cold as an Arctic ocean, and its God as inhuman as Nero. Beecher had begun his eloquent sermons for human libery. In Boston Theodore Parker proclaimed in beautiful sermon and prayer, a simple and sublime Theism, which sees high over all creeds and lesser gods the one Eternal Father as the Source of all Light, Life and Love.

Our guest was born for public life. The stars decreed on the day of his birth that he should be a preacher. In fact, I am quite certain that there was a council of stars on this occasion. Some first commanded him to preach; and Mercury, the swift-winged messenger of the gods, said he would write; while Herschel, the slow and strange giant of the skies, closed the interview by saying that they could do what they pleased with him in early life, but that he would make him a traveler in later years. He began preaching in early life. So generous was his heart, he chose the most humane creed of all, and began to preach Universalism as taught by the cultured Chapin.

But this work must soon change. There were other signs in the skies and sounds in the air. Young Science had cast aside its infant clothes and grown into a giant, measuring arms with theology on the intellectual stage. This Samson of intellectual strength tore down many a theological castle as easily as David slew Goliath. Herbert Spencer announced the law of evolution and rhythm of motion. Darwin began his search, with keen, intellectual headlight, in a museum of monkeys, baboons and chimpanzees, to find the origin of man. Geologists were beating rocks for fossils of the long dead ages. Chemists in their laboratories were driving matter on rollers of fire from solids to gases, as children play with toys. Astronomers turned the eyes of the telescope up into the blue heavens, watching the gorgeous pageantry of the stars as they marched forever around their central suns. Physiologists, with whetted blades of polished steel, cut away muscles, nerves, arteries and into the gray matter encased in human skulls.

But science nowhere found a conscious, human soul. The hour was ominous. Rachels were weeping for children Death's cold hand had touched—weeping love was calling, but no sound came back from death's deserted halls. Science could not find a human soul.

In this fearful silence, when doubt and hope sat under a weeping cloud in life's lone Gethsemane, sounds were heard in Hydesville, New York. They were not terrific like thunder-peals or rumbling earthquakes, but gentle as the cooing of a dove or the soft patter of raindrops on the parched roof that covers a sleeping child. From beyond the hollow empire of death voices had fallen at last into love's sensitive ear as sweetly as moonbeams fall upon the crystal lips of a glassy lake.

Our friend listened to these sounds, and a new world opened before him. He had preached faith and a free salvation; now, like Saul on the way to Damascus, a voice had called him. He soon found himself immerged by the great psychical wave sweeping over the arid desert of materialism.

He has proclaimed the new gospel with tongue and pen for more than half a century, and five times girdled the globe. Of those who labored with him in the first decades of this movement, nearly all have crossed the divide. Only Andrew Jackson Davis, the Swedenborg of the nineteenth century, and a few remain. Edmonds, Talmage, Tiffany, Hallock, Denton, the eloquent Brittan, with classical pen, and Finney, with his tongue of fire, have been transferred to the public of the skies:

Eighty and six years! What a wealth of experience he has gained! One can not travel the wide world over, as he has traveled it, without learning great truths narrow minds can not conceive. Humboldt was a great traveler. He loved the physical world and traveled much to investigate its surface. After he had viewed rivers, mountains and seen and climbed Chimborazo till the blood oozed from his lips and gums, he found the Cosmos. He learned that the Rhine, Po, Danube, Mississippi, and Amazon were so many great arteries through one world. The mountains and volcanoes were one—this physical world one great body.

So I apprehend our friend, the doctor, has found humanity is one. He has had his enemies, inspired by envy. What moral hero, what reformer has not? Such traducers, like shapeless clouds and driftwood, soon sink away into the maelstrom of forgetfulness. The mother nursing her babes clad in furs, in cold Kamchatka, the wretched beings in desolate Borneo, the beggar in his rags, the millionaire in his palace are, after all, one humanity, touched by the same loves, fired by the same hopes, traveling to the same grave—hoping, praying, for the same heaven.

He has also, no doubt, learned that the world's religions are one at their core. The Indian's great Spirit, the Christian's Jehovah, or God, the Hindu's Brahm, and the wandering Bedouin, the hoofs of whose flying steed beat the desert sands, and who prays to Allah,—are calling different names to express the over-arching Intelligence which girds us 'round about, and in whom we live and have being.

Eighty and six years! What mighty changes! When he was born Queen Victoria was a child of only three years, playing in the home of the Hanovers in England. He has lived through her long reign—(one of the noblest queens God ever gave to an empire. Indeed, she was more than queen; she was a woman, with a woman's heart.)

Less than twelve months before our friend's birth, the old Napoleon died in the paroxysms of a storm at Helena. When he was born our great nation was young, and Ohio a new state in the Federal Union. The great West was almost unknown. Where stood the Indian's wigwam, there great cities have shot up like a star.

He was a boy of more than four years when Jackson was first elected president, and the old hero went to the chair with a broken heart, by the death of the lovely wife he buried at the Hermitage. When he was born, Samuel Morse was painting his portrait of Lafayette, in New York, and he had reached early manhood when Morse had perfected the telegraph and won the thanks of the nation. When he was born, the nations had no steam railroads, and steamships were in their infancy. He has lived to five times girdle the earth in steamers, and is as much at home upon the ocean's breast as a child in the arms of a loving mother.

Telegraph systems, telephones, graphophones, railroads, horseless carriages and air-ships are all the creatures of his day. He is with us now in the opening of the electrical age. What prophet can tell us what marvel this new wizard of earth, air and sky, shall perform? Are we not already stealing the secrets of the universe? And shall not man soon wave the magical wand of universal empire, causing wild and terrific nature to bow at his feet?

Eighty and six years! And still our friend is not old. Victor Hugo once said: "The snow of winter is upon my head, but the eternal spring-time is in my heart." Alpine travelers tell us that the purest mountain streams course beneath the snow-clad Alps and thread their way far underneath the mountain avalanche. Gray hairs are the stainless down angels drop on the storm-beaten heads of life's heroes. The wrinkles on the faces of pilgrims are furrows, when the heart is all too small to contain the tide swell of its emotion. Love, hope and joy never grow old.

Brother Peebles, my voice grows tremulous when I turn to you for this closing word. The memory of forty years' friendship rebukes my weakness. You are in the house of your friends to-night. These tender letters are all for you. This sweet voice of song is for you. These flowers are all yours, and love's tender hand has gathered them for you. If it were in our power, we would give you to-night a flower for every thorn your tired feet may have pressed on life's dusty journey. If we could, we would transform every sigh your weary heart may have drawn into a singing seraph chanting for you, in the illumined bowers of Eden, a song of praise. Could we do it, all the tears your swollen eyes may have wept, would now be made a sun-kissed sea of joy. Go on, brave pilgrim, up century's summit! May each to-morrow grow brighter still, and when your feet shall cross the divide out into the land of unending to-morrows, may each one grow brighter and fairer, as the eternal ages let fall their golden sands around you.

"It will be remembered by you, fellow-citizens of Clyde, that mine host was a number of years ago styled at Lily Dale "the silver-tongued orator,' and listening to his thrillingly eloquent address just now, we can only say—the silver-tongued of the past has been transmuted into the golden mouthed of the present."—J. M. P.

Doctor Peebles' Feeling Response.

"I now call upon Dr. Peebles," said the president, Mrs. French.

The doctor rising and casting his eyes over the audience, at the letters just read, and at Mr. French, who had quietly taken his seat, said:

I can not give an address of response. I am overpowered with emotion. Your surprise was complete. The secret was well kept. I did not know that your president, so ably filling the position this evening, had written to one of my friends.

No, I can not talk this evening; my lips are half paralyzed; my brain is whirling in gratitude. I will write out in the future what I would like to say now while the spell of good will is upon you.

This occasion is somewhat embarrassing because looking back over the long pathway of the past I feel that I have only done my duty in whitening harvest fields of reforms.

Eighty-six, and what of it! Often I feel like a gaysome youth of sixteen. The inmost spirit never grows old. Age does not hinge upon dates or years. Active, aged persons have not outgrown their usefulness. Their white hairs are inspirations to others. Though not feeling to shrink any duty I would rather be eighty-six than seventy-six, or sixty-six.

One sweetly solemn thought comes to me o'er and o'er,
I'm nearer my spirit home to-day than e'er I was before.

All should grow gracefully, ripening like the apple, which, ruddy in the sunshine and morning dew, drops at last into the fruit-gatherer's basket. And so the sunset of life should be more beautiful than its sunrise. Youth, like opening buds, has its work in front of it, while old age, with its stint well done, ready to go when the summons comes, has a quiet charm of its own, a calm richness as of autumnal forests, a serene sanctity like that of a moss-embowered cathedral, and the dignity of the towering oak that reeling, tottering in passing gales and storms, stands—still stands an inviting, shady retreat for grazing herds and foot-weary travelers.

Old age is a quiet letting-go—fame, riches, fashions fading, the great, living, pulsing world of spirit seems coming closer, dearer, and more beautiful. The individual is overshadowed by the cosmopolitan. Family lives widen into social, national and international brotherhood, becoming as universal as God's sunshine. He rewards enemies by forgetting them, and searches diligently for the good everywhere, desiring to leave the world more beautiful than he found it. This is a universe of order. God reigns, and ultimately, in ways oft mysterious to us, the good triumphs, transforming the thorns that pierce into white roses, which blooming send their fragrance down through the intermingling races into the far-off ages.

In these travels among the evergreen isles of the Pacific—travels in and through many so-called heathen lands, as well as the most enlightened, during these five voyages around the world, I have witnessed more sea-calms than storms, have beheld more shimmering sunbeams than dark shadows, have seen vastly more smiles than tears, and have heard thousands of merry peals of laughter ringing out from both peasant's hut and the king's palace for a single groan of agony. Surely, God is good, and so optimistic and so afire with faith am I that I travel on trustingly toward that upper city of immortality which hath substantial foundations, and, as an ancient apostle said, "whose builder and maker is God."

Though now an octogenarian and more, life was never so sweet and golden. I look back over the long journey, tangle-footed at times, without a sigh or a tear; nor do I say pessimistically, "It might have been." God and his ministering angels ever know best. "Not my will," exclaimed the Martyr and thorn-crowned Man of Nazareth, "but thy will, O God! be done." I can not in justice to my feelings abstain from quoting the beautiful words of my personal friend, the good, gray American poet, Walt Whitman. I met him for the last time previous to his departure from earth in Camden, N. J. To have heard him read his "Leaves of Grass" was, of itself, worth a short life-time.

All seems beautiful to me
I can repeat over to men and women, You have done such good to me I would do the seame to you,
I will recruit for myself and you as I go,
I will scatter myself among men and women as I go,
I will toss a new gladness and roughness among them,
Whoever denies me it shall not trouble me,
Whoever accepts me, he or she shall be blessed, and shall bless me.

Eighty-six years have I dwelt in this fleshly tabernacle. It has served me well because I built and am still building it up with care. The body does not build the spirit, but the Ego.

The conscious spirit builds the body and clothes it. The spirit of the mortal organism is a semi-detached portion of the Infinite Spirit. In consonance with the Divine Will I incarnated, and twelve times since have I re-incarnated. In this sense re-incarnation, perpetual re-incarnation, is true. Remove a finger nail and in sixteen weeks you have a new one. The soft, fleshy portions of the organization cells, muscles, nerves, ligaments change through excretions in from three months to three years, and the bones in from three to seven years—change, CHANGE, and yet I, the real, inmost man, persists—consciously persists and re-incarnates. Accordingly, I am not the man in manifestation that I was twenty-one years ago, fourteen years ago, or even seven years ago. The past was and is gone. Let it go—bury it from the memory—forget it. No one can make a past fallen hair black or white.

Each event filled its place in time's temple. None are perfect. The wisest make mistakes. The world's worst have their good traits; and down in the soul's subterranean depths all are alike—all are equally pure. To this end the clear-seeing illustrious, Andrew Jackson Davis, the father of modern Spiritualism, wisely said when in his superior state: "The foundational character of every one is innately divine and forever beautiful. It is God-like because it is an INDIVIDUAL DETACHMENT of the Monotheist principle, the Great Positive Mind. It is pure and immaculate, the same in essence as in confirmation."

Though on the eighty-seventh racetrack, marked by mile-posts toward the century, I have an immense amount of work laid out before me. As a free man, I speak the downright truth in my lectures and books, as I understand it, and I care not a pauper's penny whether praised or blamed.

I am too busy to think about death, and there is too much fuss made about dying. It is nature's process of laying down a fleshly burden, and of the rising of the spiritual into the brightness and beatitudes of immortality. Pamper not the curious with a gazing, shrinking at the corpse's face that so recently beamed in love and sweetness. Burning is preferable to burying the forsaken tenement. If not burned, then move on to the cemetery in lively moving carriages, realizing that it is the last kind act toward a deserted shell. Mourning garments, useless and often expensive, are but sombre mementoes of the Dark Ages. Black, with its aural emanations, is repellant to the lovely home-imagery of angelic life. The dying often smile, but never weep. Put flowers on the door knob, and garland the cold form with lilies and wreaths of rose-buds.

I have no conception of "tottering" down the decline of life. The phrase is beyond my comprehension. I expect to work on the very morning of my departure, and sleep into the better land of immortality at the sunset of the same evening. I feel as though I had just begun to live—to see, to comprehend. Heights rise above me, and I am conscious of the mighty immensities lying beyond. Sometimes, for the moment, a sad thought comes to me when I think that I have outlived so many of my esteemed contemporaries—Fishbough, Brittan, Denton, Kiddle, J. O. Barrett, Elder Giles B. Avery, Elder Frederick W. Evans, A. E. Newton, J. H. Harter, Damon Y. Kilgore, J. Rodes Buchanan, Joel Tiffany, Giles B. Stebbins, S. J. Finney, Judge Edmonds, Robert Dale Owen, E. V. Wilson, E. S. Wheeler, Emma H. Britten, Adin Ballou, Abram Smith, Luther Colby, William White, James Burns, S. C. Hall, William Howitt, Benjamin Coleman, Stainton Moses, and other regal-souled toilers on both sides of the Atlantic and across the Pacific waters for human good—toilers upon whose foreheads the immortals wrote, ere their transition, the words, "Faithful—true and faithful!"

The glorious company of the apostles honor them!
The goodly fellowship of the prophets honor them!
The noble army of martyrs honor them!
The mighty hosts of heavenly spirits honor them—
for their work's sake.

Increasing years bring to me no limitation, but rather expansion in the line of increasing reform labor. What I do not finish here I shall accomplish in the next stage of existence through sensitives and willing intermediaries.

This is God's world, rainbowed with promise. Come light or darkness, I don't worry. The wild animals that howl purify the air, and the rains that rust the wheat, revive the grass. Often misunderstood, sometimes misrepresented, frequently walking on thorn-piercing pavements, I stopped not by the wayside to bemoan the rough pathway, but traveled on, inspired by faith within and warmed by the shining sun above me. I never witnessed a starless night. If clouds shut away the glimmerings of the stars from my vision, I knew that they were still above, shining, and that the radiance of morning light would come.

Once I sorrowed that the golden day was dead,
Its light no more the countryside adorning;
But, whilst I grieved, behold! the East grew red
With morning.

Thanking my friends for their kind and loving congratulations and thinking of the morning—the morning-time of immortality, I trust to be pardoned if wrong for inserting the following poems, the first one being so admired by the sainted mother of Mrs. French.

THUGS MAKE VICTIM DISROBE.

Finding Only $35 and Watch, While Expecting More, They Beat Him Unconscious.

"Because he only had $35 and a silver watch in his pockets, two robbers early to-day beat Andrew Harte into insensibility. Thinking he had more money, the robbers compelled Harte to disrobe. Their search failing, they again beat him and fled.

"Harte lay in the alley near Polk and Sherman streets for several hours before he was discovered by the Harrison street police.

"He said he had recently come from Hungary, and that the money taken from him was all the money he had in the world. The police will attempt to find his friends."

Here we have a most remarkable case that occurred in this city, one that is heart-rending in every particular. These two robbers were without a single vestige of human sympathy in their nature. Finding that their victim had only $35 in his possession, they became incensed thereat and beat him into a condition of insensibility.

They doubtless have received the designation of being human beings. If so, then they are degenerates of the worst kind imaginable. Bereft of all human feelings, what is in store for them in the future? Are the entitled to immortality? Yes, perhaps, if they should reform, but being degenerates they will, when they shall have reached the spirit world, find themselves in partial, if not in total darkness. There, without the least light in their souls, they will gradually, no doubt, descend in their depravity, and at last their spirit be disintegrated, returning to the several natural provinces, as set forth by Charles Dawbarn, the California philosopher, from which they were derived.

As to absolute immortality, no one as yet has lived long enough to demonstrate it. It is a question that the wisest angel has not been able to decide; yet there are those on the spirit side of life whose wisdom cannot be questioned, who say that immortality, or a continued existence is only bestowed upon those who are entitled to it. Those who have no light in their souls will be finally blotted out of existence.

It is a mistaken idea that immortality is enforced on any living creature. If you finally gain it, YOU WILL HAVE TO EARN IT. H. S.

TO FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

The price of The Progressive Thinker per year to foreign countries is $2.

SATURDAY, JUNE 13, 1908.

WORDS OF CAUTION.

You should not send money in a letter. You may do so a dozen times safely, and then the next remittance may be lost or stolen. Secure a postal order for five cents, and then you are perfectly safe, and will save yourself annoyance and trouble.

AN ENTIRELY NEW DEAL.

The POSTAGE on papers has been increased to all the British possessions on this continent. On a single paper we are compelled to pay ONE CENT each week, amounting to 52 cents a year, whereas previously we only paid the pound rates—a mere trifle. Hence, to all the British possessions on this continent the paper hereafter will be $1.50 per year.

A Reminder of the Past—Caution for the Future.

According to the Christian dates near 2,000 years have been wasted in trying to Christianize the world. At this time the population of the earth probably a little exceeds 1600 millions of people. Counting the entire population of all so-called Christian countries, and there are less than 500 millions, Greek, Roman and Protestant Christians. Eliminate the heretics and infidels, who are very numerous in all Christian countries, far more plentiful than is generally supposed, then it is questionable if one-fifth of the entire population of the world is Christian.

At the time when it was claimed the Emperor Constantine was converted to Christianity, about A. D. 322, the Roman Empire was dominant from the Indus in the East, to the Atlantic on the west, including North Africa and the British Islands.

All the intricate countries became at once Christian by authority of law.

Not stopping to show that all those countries had a religiou precisely the same as Christian at the time of Constantine's conversion in all but the name, will not the thinker and the mathematician be so kind as to tell us, with all the prestige the Roman government brought to its aid; the crusades waged in the interests of the faith for more than one hundred years; the Inquisitorial fires and torture-chambers, and wars in which millions were slain to make converts, how long will it be before Christianity will dominate the globe?

The ease of discarding the faith when not protected by government, was seen in France during the great revolution commencing in 1789, and terminated by the strong arm a few years later, under the master hand of Napoleon.

If a country all Christian, as France was in 1789, could rise in rebellion, throw off kingly power, and priestly rule in a day, or a year, what is not possible in any other country?

With the non-warrior element, the women, eliminated from the body politic in America, how long would it require to effectually divorce church and state in this country? The fathers of the Republic designed to make the separation complete; but priestcraft gained control of the courts, and by a false interpretation of the implied powers of government, they have really habilitated church rule, absolving church property from taxation, and extending to it privileges never dreamed of by the fathers.

When the French revolution burst on the world, the wealth of France was in the church and the nobility. Substituting multimillionaires, and powerful syndicates for the French nobility, and how far short of the condition prevailing in France in 1789 from that existing in the United States to-day?

The same dissatisfaction of the middle classes, and unrest is here. The priesthood are just as tyrannous and determined to rule now as they were upwards of a hundred years ago.

We are only recounting facts, with the purpose of counseling the church to not press the people too far; for there is an element in this country insistent on the natural rights belonging to them, and once in arms to redress wrongs kind Heaven can only know where the strife will end. It is hoped not in cities on fire and a nation rolled in blood; but history has a terrible habit of repeating itself.

Celsus Was a Neo-Platonist.

It makes no difference, save for accuracy, whether Celsus was a Pagan philosopher, or a Christian Father, when he wrote:

"Whether the Supreme Being is called Zeus, or Zen,, or Adonia, or Saboth, or Ammon, or Pappacus does not matter, if all the people who use these names mean identically the same person."

And does not common sense agree with Celsus, without regard to his religious convictions?

Attention called to the subject, we find the Encyclopedia Britannica says:

"The name [Celsus] was a very common one. Upwards of twenty persons of the name are mentioned within the first three centuries of the Christian Era."

And, strange, is it not? history is uncertain which Celsus Origen made prominent by quoting his sayings, and replying to them. There was one, an Epicurean philosopher, and another, a Neo-Platonist, otherwise an Eclectic. To the non-critical reader the subject has little interest. He who cares to investigate may consult "Supernatural Religion." American edition, p. 534, to conclusion.

Since Celsus is in review, and his opinions harmonize so well with modern advanced thought, we take pleasure in copying and making accessible to all our readers, what the Christian Father Origen credits to Celsus. We quote from p. 296, Vol. 5, of Encyclopedia Britannica:

"The only possibility of the existence of such a person as the Christian Jesus that he could conceive depended upon his being demonic, but Jesus showed nothing of that majesty, that grandeur, that energy of will in worldly affairs which he deemed essential to the demon. He therefore rejected his pretensions entirely as inconsistent with his philosophy; but he believed that even on the basis of a philosophy which permitted the supernatural, the claims of Jesus must be rejected. And so his arguments are made to come from a Jew. The Jew rejects the miraculous birth of Jesus. Mary was divorced from her husband, and wandering about, fell in with a Roman soldier, Panthera, who was the father of Jesus. Jesus being needy, went down to Egypt, and there learned all the tricks by which he could work apparent miracles, and on the strength of this knowledge he claimed to be God, when he returned to Judea. But who could believe the statements made in regard to him—who heard the voice at his baptism? None but himself and a companion who shared his dream, or rather, his imposture. The miracles ascribed to him are absurd. Anyone could see such miracles by paying a few obols to an Egyptian juggler.

"If Jesus was God, would he have chosen such wicked and worthless men as his apostles? If he knew Judas would betray him why did he make him his companion?

"But the story of the resurrection seems especially absurd. He was condemned publicly before the eyes of all. No one doubts this. If he rose again, why did he not make his justification as public. Would he not have confronted his judge, his accusers, the general public, and given indubitable evidence that he was not a malefactor?

"And who saw him after he rose again? A half-insane woman and one or two followers who were in the very humor to trust to dreams, or to an excited fancy. In this way the Jew discusses many of the statements made in the gospels, and comes to the conclusion that Jesus was an ordinary man."

Says the Britannica: "Celsus then shows that the Greeks had all that was true in Christianity, but in a nobler and better form, and he ends with a practical application, urging Christians to give up their separatist tendency, to worship the demons, and to join in all civil and military duties imposed on citizens by the state. * *

"In exhibiting the superiority of the Greek doctrines over the Christian, Celsus points to the circumstance that THE GREEKS APPEAL TO REASON, while the CHRISTIANS CRY OUT BELIEVE, BELIEVE!"

Many modern thinkers seem to entertain views in harmony with an intelligent pagan, who gave evidence of being a person of good sense.

Who Bore the Cross to Golgotha?

Mat. 27:22 says: "They compelled Simon to bear the cross." John 19:-16,17—"They took Jesus and led him away, he bearing his own cross."

The inscription on the cross, Matthew says was: "This is Jesus the King of the Jews." Mark says the inscription was: "The King of the Jews." Luke says the words were: "This is the King of the Jews." While John makes the inscription read "Jesus of Nazareth the King of the Jews.'

The discrepancy in statement varies in all the principal narratives relating to the crucifixion, the hour and the persons who visited the tomb, the time and place of his ascension, and furnishes the skeptic with cause to suspicion the whole story is a fabrication. Attempts at reconciliation only make the inharmony the more apparent. In courts of law witnesses making such variant statements are treated as self-impeached.

Will Stand Aghast, Stricken and Helpless.

That is a crushing yet truthful statement of Prof. Wenley, of the University of Michigan, before an Episcopal Congress, wherein he said:

"The truths of Christianity do not seem to be peculiar to it. Similar teachings are found in other and older religions."

The Progressive Thinker has challenged the clergy many times, and now repeats, defying them to name one symbol, just one symbol, sacrament, or article of faith common to Christians, which was not in use by religious sects long before the alleged birth of Jesus. We have proved that what are denominated pagan religions absolutely practiced the eucharistic sacrament, as also baptism, and employed the cross as their symbol ages ago, before there was a Christian.

We are prepared to prove that belief in Osiris was the corner stone in the Egyptian religion, exactly as faith in the saving grace of Jesus is the corner-stone of Christianity.

And now another fact. The three Gods in one, the Father, Son and Holy Ghost is purely Egyptian, was borrowed from Egyptian mythology, and as originally taught did not do gross violence to common sense. It represented the sun as God, which they worshiped. It bore one name at its rising, another name at noon, another at its setting, and all the time it was the same worshipful sun. Such facts cannot be controverted, and they make possible the further statement of Prof. Wenley:

"The material for a biography of Jesus does not exist. My own conviction is that the negative process of historical research is destined to travel even farther, and it may be when criticism comes to clarify the evidence and to reconstruct the situation from an 'exact' historical standpoint, WE SHALL STAND AGHAST, STRICKEN AND HELPLESS."

A Terrible Shortage of Preachers.

A suggestive fact was revealed by the Presbyterian General Assembly, while in session at Kansas City, "How to recruit the depleted ministry?" It was one of the gravest questions the Assembly had to encounter, and was pending as we wrote. During the discussion it was shown the church claims a membership of four millions, while only 117 are fitting themselves for the ministry. Rev. F. W. Sned of Pittsburg, chairman of the board of education, declared:

"An adequate ministry is the question of the hour. What does it matter that we have a promising field for religious effort if we have no minister to send into that field. The low-water mark for ministerial candidates was reached five years ago, and it has not improved a bit."

Instead of a surprise it is a wonder how any self-respecting young man who has taken a regular collegiate course, and familiarized himself with the natural sciences can become so degenerate as to enter an orthodox pulpit, throw his learning to the dogs, and teach the ignorance of two thousand to five thousand years ago, as taught in the Bible. Bishop Grafton, of Fond du Lac, Wis., some years agone, furnished the key-note, which guides all who enter an ecclesiastical pulpit:

"We of the clergy have been made by the church her ministers to teach, not what we think is true, but what she puts into our mouths to teach."

If the preacher teaches any scientific truth which conflicts with the Bible, he is a heretic, and is silenced No student with good sense is content to sacrifice his manhood to teach what he knows is false.

Hudson Tuttle.

A note from Hudson Tuttle brings the information that he has been quite unwell for a few weeks past, down to the danger-line, in fact. His friends will be glad to learn that he is now on the road to recovery, and hopes he will soon be able to answer the many correspondents whose letters have accumulated during his illness. Good thoughts and best wishes will surely go to him from all our readers.

Changing Front.

We see it stated in the public press that the Congregational church in Augusta, Maine, has appointed a committee to revise its creed so persons may become members without declaring a belief in "Christ."

It was only a little while ago the announcement was made that Andover Theological Seminary, where orthodox clergymen were made, after doing service for a century with abundant resources, finally closed its doors, and died the death that knows no waking. Heaven hasten the day when Truth shall triumph over Error, and Right over Wrong the wide-world over, shall be our constant prayer.

Undertaken a Great Task.

A Buddhist missionary, sustained by ample means, has set out to reform England, and indoctrinate those heathen in the true faith. Of course he will attempt to eradicate the prevalent war spirit, and the slaughter of animals. Success to the movement is the wish of The Progressive Thinker.

A Trenchant Communication.

The Great Work The Progressive Thinker is Doing.—How to Make the Cause Respected.—A Better Understanding in the Eyes of the Law Wanted.

To the Editor: How do you manage to get together such an array of brilliant, interesting and philosophical articles as appear every week in the columns of your paper? If one wants the latest news along the lines of spiritual or liberal work, you always have it; if we want to know the latest methods by which we can get fooled out of our money by those who PROFESS to be mediums, we can learn it here, while at the same time you furnish us with the most thoroughly authentic accounts of wonderful manifestations taking place in the presence of true and tried psychics. We get it all, poetry, philosophy, phenomena, discussions and opinions of the brightest minds of the day, all about what the workers, both on and off the rostrum, are doing, and all for two cents a week. It is a fine thing to have such an avenue through which to exchange ideas.

I wish some of your bright writers would tell us what we can do to make our cause more respected and to give us a better standing in the eyes of the law. Of course, we can, as individuals, live uprightly, and by each one keeping their own dooryard clean, do much to make the whole sweet and wholesome, but I mean as an organized body.

Our attention has been called very forcibly by the troubles through which the noted medium and public worker, Mrs. Pepper Vanderbilt, has been called to pass. When belief in Spiritualism was brought up in court as a sufficient reason for declaring Mr. Vanderbilt incompetent, the judge said that a man's religion could not be interfered with. Then the opposing lawyer came forward with the argument that Spiritualism was not a religion, that its followers made no pretense of religion, did not use the Bible in their services, nor pray to God.

We have got the very best religion in the world, the only reasonable belief, the only one that an honorable man or woman ought to be willing to accept, for it teaches us that we must pay our own debts, not throw them on the shoulders of another; that we must work for whatever of eternal blessedness we hope to attain, the only one that gives us hope and comfort when we are called upon to part with our loved ones, the only one that we do not have to accept wholly on faith, one that we can test for ourselves and prove its truth, the very cap sheaf of all progressive thought, and yet in the eyes of the law, WHAT HAVE WE GOT? Nothing that entitles us to the respect and considerations that is accorded other denominatione. What shall we do about it?

Though personal aims and animosities have outwardly seemed to be the cause of the persecutions to which Mr. and Mrs. Vanderbilt have been subjected, SPIRITUALISM HAS BEEN ON TRIAL. Back of all has been hatred of, and determination to down Spiritualism, through its noted representative, Mrs. Vanderbilt. No one can believe for one moment that the suit to declare Mr. Vanderbilt incompetent would have been brought had he chosen to marry a Methodist or a Baptist. No lawyer could have been found to have undertaken the case, but to marry a Spiritualist, of course, he MUST be insane. Though this has been a sore trial to our sister, we feel that good may come of it. Spiritualists will be awakened to the necessity of doing something that will put us in a better position before the courts of law.

We need not all think alike or be obliged to subscribe to exactly the same articles of belief. If we had rather pray to our arisen friends than to God, no harm is done. All good Catholics pray to Mary and all the saints in the calendar. Personally, I feel that should stand a better show if I should ask my spirit father or mother to assist me, than to ask either the saints, or a God that I never saw and can not possibly comprehend, and that must necessarily have much more important business on hand than attending to my little wants; but we all recognize a supreme power, call it God or Nature, and it can not harm us to try and bring ourselves, by prayer and aspiration, in touch with the power that governs the universe and all its workings.

We are prone to think that the hard work has all been done by the pioneers, and that we have nothing to do but to enjoy our new found freedom of thought, but there is much more hewing and cutting to be done before our temple will stand fair and complete in the eyes of the world. But it is coming; in spite of opposition from the outside, and fraud and indifference within our ranks, our cause is advancing.

The work in New England is in a prosperous condition generally. The anniversaries were more fully attended this year than for many years and more interest shown. Young workers that will be a credit to the cause are coming forward and people seem to be looking forward to the approaching camp season with more than usual interest.

Though six Weeks in Water, Retina of Murdered Woman Shows Bearded Man.

St. Louis, May 31.—The picture of a bearded, crooked nosed man, on the eyeball of an unidentified murdered woman whose body was taken from the Mississippi river, near Hartford, Ill., may be the clue to the mystery of her death.

The unknown died from a broken neck, and was not drowned. The absence of water in the lungs proved she was thrown in the river after she was murdered.

The theory that the dying gaze of a person upon the slayer will fix a picture permanently on the eye caused the authorities to have a photograph of the dead woman's retina made, though she had been in the water almost six weeks. Oculists say the theory is correct.

Coroner Streeper and Wilbert C. Ward declare that they are able to detect on the plate the face of a bearded man with a hooked nose and a sparse covering of hair on his head. The coroner and the police are using this uncanny photograph in their investigation.

The theory is that a blow on the woman's nose which was fractured threw her head backward with such force that it fractured her neck.

A SPIRIT MESSAGE.

Automatically Written Through the Hand of Frederika G. Bell.

Thursday Circle, May 12, 1908.—We are with you, and as you are fewer to-day, we will endeavor to give you an experience of ours over here. We were attracted to your earth on the occasion of an anniversary of ours. We found people celebrating the day, and were surprised at the ignorance expressed by some who were supposed to be familiar with our life. We are not as infirm as we were reported to be, and as this demonstration was given in our honor, it amazed us to have the several speakers refer to us as old men. We are not old, for when we arrive here we are rejuvenated and are in perfect health. Of course, as we leave you you think of us and it is only natural. We were also surprised to find that though submissive to our laws, experts familiar with our history, they are not all of the same opinion, and various criticisms which we felt keenly, affected us in such an unpleasant manner that we deemed it advisable to correct you, as you observe we are doing.

We are of the opinion that you who live on your earth are not gaining as much information as you should. You seek entertainment of such nature as pleases your sense of amusement, and not your intellect. We having been here a century are surprised at the entire neglect manifested in your various instructors and institutions. We are of a continual progressive element, and feel that you on your earth should advocate all you can to uplift and instruct along the lines of perpetual progressing. As you become familiar with our mode of communications, we shall attract to you an element which will impart our method of advancement. You are eagerly seeking our light; we are attracting to you as much of our instructions as we can in so brief a time. We bring to you men of note who have had to learn this process of communication. As they become familiar with writing they will be able to give you light on many subjects which now are not understood.

As we said in the beginning, we are disappointed at what is being taught of us. We felt that our life's work was nobly done, and when they told you we who had gone on into the land unseen to our reward. Why did they not add, "As you sow, so you will reap." We understood they would give you a dissertation on advantages gained over here; but no such remarks were made, and we feel that unless those who are Spiritualists will devote more time in explaining our lives and actions upon this planet, your churches will take away all we have given to you.

You understand that this is an age where people are eagerly seeking what they have not found in their creeds, therefore tell them of our communications to you, and prove our return to the satisfaction of all inquirers. We attended this anniversary of ours to the advent of spirit communications or Modern Spiritualism. I was one of the founders of what is known as the Quakers, and we were the original Spiritualists. We manifested our works through the spirit in a different way, but our philosophy was the same. We are glad to give you our writing, and as you go on in this work, give to the hungry, eager seeker all the phenomena that you can, and even though it is decried, you will be able to extract from the fraudulent only what genuine truth we have. We know what is taking place and are glad that the truth seekers are exterminating all of the fakers. We will be able to prove so forcibly our communications and demonstrations through genuine mediums that this investigation will prove a blessing in disguise. As we become associated with various intelligences coming to our spheres, who have been in earth teachers and instructors of our philosophy, we are able to give them light of ours from spheres beyond.

When you of earth meet with criticism and censure, ask these people what they know, and if it is as good as what you can tell them, all will be satisfaction. We know that their limitations are so inadequate to your knowledge that their insults should only be as a ripple on the stream. We observe that the times are in such a critical position with you on earth, that eagerly the people grasp at any light which will lead them a step higher than their own. We will be able to impart much instruction in our philosophy as the result of your research. You are attracting to your planet a condition which will be of great benefit to mankind. This attraction is from a source beyond us and is known as the stellar lights. We can bring in such knowledge through laws known to our planet and also to a few upon yours.

A CHALLENGE.

He Offers $25 if Forbush, the Materializing Medium Who Was Thoroughly Exposed at Grand Rapids, Mich., Will Produce a Single Genuine Materialization Under Strict Test Conditions.

To the Editor: Forbush was in this city several weeks ago, and gave two seances which were attended by some of the prominent Spiritualists here, and this after he was exposed so thoroughly some months ago. I really cannot understand how Spiritualists, if they have any grey matter in their head at all, can be duped so easily.

I will give Mr. Furbush $25 in cash if can produce a form under test conditions. I also challenge Mrs. Fuller to produce any voice through the trumpet under strict test conditions.

It is a conundrum to me why mediums who profess to be genuine have to be forced to prove the fact.

A THRILLING RESCUE.

Mrs. Carrie M. Hinsdale, President of the Texas State Spiritualist Association, Gives an Account of Her Rescue in the Flood at Ft. Worth, Texas, in the Telegram of That City.

I have just read the account of my rescue in your paper. My heart is full of gratitude to the men who saved my life. I wish to describe the event for your readers, so that all may know how brave the men were.

Mr. Gus Zimmerman, one of my neighbors, and another man, whose name I do not know, came on horseback to the house. Della Heyworth, a sister-in-law of Mr. Zimmerman, got on behind him. I was in the saddle one the other horse, the man behind me. We had not gone twenty yards when the horse threw us. I caught my hand in the mane of the horse, and he struggled, snorting and drowning 200 feet, with me being tossed in the water and out again many times.

Mr. Zimmerman took the little girl to safety and came back through the raging water after me. As soon as he got close he called: "Turn loose, Mrs. Hinsdale; turn loose!" I did so and reached my arms to him.

In the meantime, the man who had been on the horse with me had climbed on a bench, washed from the park, which was turned up, and had caught in a barbed wire fence. Mr. Zimmerman, realizing he could not carry me out, dragged me to this bench and told me to hold on.

The man (I wish I knew his name) helped me to climb on and we sat astride this upturned bench for hours. Men on shore got ropes and tried to reach us in boats, but time and time again they started, to be driven back by the raging current. We watched it all, and I despaired of their ever reaching us.

The man on the bench with me, when I said we would both be drowned, replied: "I could swim out, but I will not leave you; that's a cinch!"

After so many hours of failure a man (Mr. Moser, I presume) got in the boat in which another neighbor, Mr. Will Houghton, had been trying to get someone to go with him to our rescue.

They managed, by dashes from tree to tree to get to us, chained the boat to the nearest tree and let the stern swing round to us. The man clinging to the bench with me never for an instant relaxed a tight grip on my arm, and when Mr. Houghton was trying to get me in the boat told him to "Save the lady; never mind about me!" But they told him to climb in. After we were seated in the bottom of the boat, they rushed again from tree to tree until they got above Mr. Houghton's house, and allowed the boat to drift to his back fence, where, hand over hand, they pulled it to the back porch, put us out and sent us through the house.

They had a struggle to get to the front against the terrific current. Having finally got to the front porch, we got in again and hand over hand, on ropes already stretched by willing hands, pulled half way to shore, where the rope was wrenched from their hands. The boat, nearly capsizing, swung back to the house, fortunately, and again they started. Men ran into the rushing, roaring torrent to hold the rope and when we came near enough Chief Maddox and another man picked me up and carried me to the ambulance and ordered them to take me to the Emergency Hospital.

To the four men, Messrs. Zimmerman, Houghton and the two whose names I do not know, I owe my life, and to all who aided in every way I owe thanks. Never sweeter sound than the cheering, for it said the people on shore believed us saved and encouraged me.

If this should reach the eye of the man who was with me on the horse, and who clung to my arm so faithfully, I would like to have him call on me some day. I want to know his name. My heart is full of thankfulness and gratitude to everyone. I am badly bruised, muscles wrenched, stiff and aching, but no broken bones.

M. CAMILLE FLAMMARION.

He is a Firm Believer in the Power of Spirit Return.

M. Camille Flammarion, in response to an invitation from the editor of "La Nation," has written a most interesting letter, in which he enumerates a host of physical phenomena connected with Spiritualism, as having come under his personal observation, and which, as he points out, can be explained only by the intervention of some intelligent force or being, entirely external to himself. Upon one occasion he mentions that he received the following message through a table:

"Erdnermoc ed sinrep erocne sap tse suov en li 'uq snoitseuq sed ridnoforppa ruop tirpse'l sap zeetnemruot suov en." Now, at the first glance, this apparently cryptic communication would appear to be mere unintelligible gibberish; but, as anyone acquainted with French will readily perceive, the sentence, if read backwards, and rendered into English, contains the following injunction: "Do not worry your mind by probing questions which you are not permitted at present to comprehend." M. Flammarion goes on to ask, "Who rapped out these letters? Consciously, no one. The muscles, invoked by some medical men, will not account for them; and I felt the vibration of the wood. There was, in this case, a force at work at once physical and psychic. Is it an intelligence inside or outside of ourselves? Is it a spirit? And, if so, what kind of spirit? He then proceeds to examine each of the phenomena seriatim, and to show, as the result of forty-six years of scientific observation and investigation, that they are incapable of any rational explanation that excludes the spiritual one; and that they are manifestations of a universal dynamism with which our five senses can only place us in communication very imperfectly. "We find ourselves," he concludes, "in a situation analogous to that of Christopher Columbus on the night before the day upon which the land of the New World dawned upon his vision—we are sailing upon the broad expanse of an unknown ocean."—Harbinger of Light, Australia.

ANTI-FAKIR SOCIETY FIGHT SPIRITISTS

Opposes New Ordinance Allowing Semi-Tropic Organization Exemption From License Unless Members Are Ordained.

Robert T. Hale, 1042 Santee street, appeared before the supervisors today and stated that as a representative of the Anti-Fakirs' Society of Los Angeles county he felt it his duty to oppose the proposed amendment to the county law imposing a tax upon those who practice Spiritualism, clairvoyance and other things of that nature for a fee.

Mr. Hale, who is a member of the State and National Spiritualists' Associations, was one of those most active in having the present ordinance passed. He is opposed to any amendment which exempts from the license any who do not have papers of ordination from one of these associations.

Represenetatives of the Semi-Tropic Spiritualist Association, which is establishing a colony near Glendale, appeared before the board a week ago, and requested an amendment which would exempt the association directors and employees from the $30 a month license provided in the ordinance. It was this that caused Mr. Hale's appearance before the board to-day.

Hartley Shaw, deputy district attorney, has drawn up an amendement, which he presented to the board this afternoon without recommendation. It is not as broad as the one suggested by the Semi-Tropic Association people, exempting only duly authorized and active teachers, lecturer, pastors, mediums or ministers of a church or society owning not less than $1,500 worth of property in the county.—The Express, Los Angeles, Cal., June 2.

Be ashamed to die till you have won some victory for humanity.—Horace Mann.

Men are often capable of greater things than they perform. They are sent into the world with bills of credit, and seldom draw to their full extent.—Horace Walpole.

In wonder all philosophy [say religion] began, in wonder it ends, and admiration fills up the interspace; but the first wonder is the offspring of ignorance, the last is the parent of adoration.—Coleridge.

We have, in fact, to make our choice between science and suffering. It is only by wisely utilizing the gifts of science that we have any hope of maintaining our population in plenty and comfort. Science, however, will do this for us if we will only let her.—Sir John Lubbock.

The new church will be founded on moral science. Poets, artists, musicians, philosophers, will be its prophet teachers. The noblest literature of the world will be its Bible. Love and labor its holy sacraments—instead of worshiping one savior, we will gladly build an altar for everyone who has suffered for humanity.—Emerson.

Thought Vibrations.

Written by Henry Morrison Tefft, Norwich, N. Y.

At the time Roosevelt published his life of Cromwell, the New York Evening Post said it could be more properly called Cromwell's life of Roosevelt. Ibsen says of himself, "Everything that I had written has the closest possible connection with what I have lived through, even if it has not been my personal experience." The book, the painting, the statue, the oration, are only pictures thrown off, of the author, the artist, the sculptor and the speaker. A person can not divorce himself from his work; they are identical in form, spirit and thought. Nature always asserts herself.

One man will glance rapidly through a book and breathe in the spirit of its contents more thoroughly than another after reading it a month. One person reads and forgets; another reads, memorizes, and recites without comprehending the teachings. Some people will divine truth by instinct or intuition, quicker than others can by reason and logic. It is related that Hugo, in conversation upon a certain occasion with Turgeneff, spoke of Wallenstein as being Goethe's best work.

"Pardon me," said Turgeneff, "Wallenstein is not Goethe's but Schiller's."

"No matter," replied Hugo; "I have read neither of these authors, I understand their spirit better than those who know them."

In every age the few do the thinking, and the mass do the following. One man blazes a path over which succeeding millions are to travel. Most people are echoes, sounding boards, giving out other people's voices. If it had not been for the pioneers of thought, the iconoclasts, the breaker of idols, men whose teachings in their time were condemned by the public, men who have been pilloried, burned at the stake, crucified, we, to-day, would be believing the earth, instead of revolving in space, rested on the back of some huge animal; we would be believing in a material hell, burning with fire and brimstone; we would be believing that an infant, dying before it came to the years of understanding, was doomed to eternal punishment. A large majority of mankind take all their beliefs, all their creeds, politics and religion from others; they have no power to formulate an idea of their own. But it needs something besides mental equipment to accomplish great ends. Neither men of science, nor men of letters, nor philosophers ever established a religion or founded an empire. It required coarser fiber and stronger purpose than could be found in the ranks of the learned or from among the authors of elegant literature to bring about these great results.

In every country one man towers above all the rest. Sometimes it is a warrior, sometimes a philosopher, sometimes a poet, and sometimes a fanatic. In China, Confucius; in Persia, Zoroaster; in India, Buddha; in Greece, Homer; in Italy, Dante; in Russia, Peter the Great; in Germany, Goethe; in France, Napoleon; in England, Shakespeare; in America, Washington.

Mentally and morally nations are graded the same as individuals. From an intellectual standpoint, ancient Greece still leads the world. Numbers don't count; it is mind, thought, brain-power that weighs. The ancient Greeks were not as practical as men are at the present day, but they were more intellectual and philosophical. Nothing in modern times has equaled the fineness, the keenness and the intellectual quality of the Greek brains. In intellectual greatness and moral worth Greece outweighs China. Stoddard, in his "Lectures," speaking of Greece, says, "Yet, in the light of what a few Athenians accomplished in the days of Phidias, China's four hundred millions seem like shadows cast by moving clouds. China compared to Athens! The enlightened world could better lose the entire continent of Asia from its history than that little area."

Each age lays particular emphasis on some form of art. Art is the true expression of the spirit and thought of the people in which it originates. Architecture, sculpture, painting, the drama, the novel, are all mental, emotional, spiritual pictures of life. Every country has its own political, moral and religious ideals. There can be no uniformity among the nations of the earth, of beliefs or of worship, because God speaks a different word to different peoples and to different individuals. "No change," says one writer, "is legitimate or beneficial to the real character of a people except what flows from conviction and natural growth of the mind." You cannot Americanize Asia; you cannot Americanize Europe. One country will borrow and adopt certain ideas and practices from another, but not their nationality. The differences of people of different countries are organic. The preface to Draper's Intellectual Development of Europe, says: "Social advancement is as completely under the control of natural law as is bodily growth. The life of the individual is a miniature of the life of the nation."

Cyclones, tornadoes, storms, all are goverend by law. Great movements in history, moral, political, social, follow well defined paths and to a certain extent they can be foreshadowed. One state of society is a certain prophecy of what the next must be. More and more are we learning that life is a repetition; individual life and national life move in cycles. All new inventions are only old ones re-discovered. "There is nothing new under the sun" is the most profound truth ever uttered. It is not certain that civilization has reached a higher state to-day than it has occupied many times before. The search of the archaeologist is constantly putting our boasted superiority to naught. The blotting out of a race, or of a civilization is only a natural incident in the history of the world. It has occurred in the past; it will occur again in the future. But there is always, somewhere, a remnant saved sufficiently to renew again the earth with life and light. The destruction is never complete. Even in the Biblical account of the flood, the greatest catastrophe known to human knowledge, we read that one family was saved from which all future generations were to spring.

Who was saved when heaven's vast fountains
Did their flood of death begin?
And all flesh on plains and mountains
Perished in its awful sin?
Only Noah
In the ark of God shut in:

Who was saved from direst horror
At that unexpected hour,
When both Sodom and Gomorrah
Sank o'erwhelmed to rise no more?
Lot the faithful
Was alone removed to Zoar."

But what we called the judgments of God are only the working out and the fulfillments of the natural laws of the universe.

Nature has no conscience, no morality, no sin or righteousness; these come into being by a law of progress and evolution which no one can explain. "The existence of evil," say Goldwin Smith, "so far as we can see, is the necessary condition of active life." Vice uses the virtues for a setting. The same drug acts both as a curative and a poison. Music both purifies and debases; if lifts up and pulls down. The summer shower that brings the flower into blossom also adds strength and growth to the most noxious weed. War and progress go hand in hand. No nation was ever rescued from barbarism except by force. Things incongruous dwelt together. Immorality and religion live harmoniously in the same individual heart. A negro while very religious is often very immoral.

Whether a thing is good or bad, righteous or sinful, humiliating or elevating depends upon circumstances. Custom fashions our habits, our ideas, our daily walk and conversation. What is degradation at one time is distinction at another; what is a source of pride and satisfaction in one age is humiliation in a succeeding one. In a running stream of water it is only a short road "from poison to purity." The sublime, it is said, is only one step above the ridiculous. The highest state and social functions are often attended with much that is ludicrous and obsolete. Both private and public acts are, sometimes, regulated and controlled by the most trivial circumstances. We read how the question of who should occupy the throne of Japan was once decided by a wrestling match. Also the story is told that Lasko II was chosen king of Poland because in a footrace he was declared a winner.

Society is governed as much by custom as the individual. Originality means strength; the imitator is always weak. But the most determined man moves with faltering steps. We say emphatically what we would do or what we would not do under a given state of facts, but in the journey of life no one knows, in advance, when approaching a point where the road divides, whether his course will be to the right or to the left. No fiction, however startling or dramatic, equals actual experience. Some novelists write the last chapter of their book first. They begin with the climax and end with the preface. Many a life is fashioned after this pattern; it ends where it ought to have begun. A progressive man resembles an army on the march; it bivouacs only one night in a place; in the morning it moves on. But there are people who run the whole gamut of beliefs from orthodoxy to infidelity, and finally in old age come around again to the point from whence they started. It is hard to live on the diet of unbelief.

Ignorance believes, knowledge doubts. Macaulay says, "The truth is, no powers of mind constitute a security against errors. * * * Touching God and his ways with man, the highest human faculties can discover little more than the meanest. In theology, the interval is small, indeed, between Aristotle and a child, between Archimedes and a naked savage. It is not strange, therefore, that wise men weary of investigation, tormented by uncertainty, longing to believe something and yet seeing objections to everything, should submit themselves absolutely to teachers who, with firm and undoubting faith, lay claim to supernatural commission. Thus we frequently see iniquisitive and restless spirits take refuge from their own skepticism in the bosom of a church which pretends to infallibility, and after questioning the existence of a Deity, bring themselves to worship a wafer." The heart often denies what the lips speak. We hold on to a name, form, or a symbol long after the substance for which it stood has departed. Men's views change gradually, impercitibly. All intense feeling is transient. Very few have a change so sudden, complete and radical as had Saul of Tarsus. If our knowledge was complete, nothing would be supernatural or mysterious. Ignorance is the author of all that we deem miraculous, of all that we deem transcendent and above law. There is no boundary between the finite and the Infinite—the difference is in degree and not in kind. The two horse-power engine is driven by the same kind of power as the four horse power engine; the difference between the two is with amount of force capable of being used. Who can draw the line between God, Nature, Law? Are they not words denoting the same power? We speak of things sacred and things profane,—but the distinction is confusing. The dedication of a building to the service of man is as sacred as its dedication to the service of God. In every man there is the divine and the human; that which partakes of the flesh and that which partakes of the spirit. There are times, in the same life, when one or the other of these influences predominates. The scales rarely balance. The public life and the individual are often at variance. "To put as much stress upon the private life of Franklin, Webster and Clay as upon their public service would probably cause every third person to strike their names from his list of national heroes. The biographer and the photographer always make their subjects appear in the very best possible light. The true character of a man is not always to be obtained by reading the printed page.

No true history of a man was ever written. It is only what appears on the surface that goes into the record. The most interesting part of human experience cannot be caught by the pen, brush or camera. The great passions, sentiments and emotions that enter into personal action do not sit for their pictures. The best part of a sermon, lecture or address is never printed. Some one has said that a speech which reads well was poorly delivered. The eloquence of such men as William Pitt, Henry Clay, Charles Spurgeon and William J. Bryan can not be put upon paper or imprisoned in type; they have got to heard, otherwise the magnetism accompanying their words is lost. A noted critic once said, "The orator and the audience are two brothers, who are born and who die in a day." The speeches of the greatest orators the world has produced "perished with their delivery." Words are only one of the mediums of expressing what is in the heart of the speaker; a look, the tone of the voice, a gesture, sometimes makes a more complete revelation than language.

There are actors whose very appearance on the stage is sufficient to conquer an audience and bring it to willing obedience to their will. The personality of a man may carry more weight than his message. Mankind are governed by feeling, sentiment, passion, more than by reason. Argument does not stir people when great issues are at stake; the imagination has to be appealed to. Listening to martial music, looking at the flag, hearing patriotic speeches, will arouse the spirit of patriotism and love of country in the heart of the most indifferent citizen. We never stop to analyze the motive or moving cause that prompts our action.

The mind is in constant flux. Whatever remains stationary is dead. We change ourselves, then those around us. Revolutions first take place in the minds of the people—then comes public demonstration.

There is such a thing as a person being too well satisfied, too contented, too comfortable. Minot J. Savage once said, "I have never thought it was a calamity for Adam to be turned out of Paradise, to speak of the story for a moment as though it was historical. I think it would have been the worst thing that could have happened to the race if he had not eaten the apple and been sent adrift into the wide, rough world to create new conditions and to develop himself in the process."

Life is a duty imposed, not a blessing conferred. In the universal economy the birth or death of a man is of no more moment than the birth or death of a worm. Who can say that the latter is not as necessary in the construction of the world as the former? The creation of a human being was not a moral act. Men are not naturally honest, they are not naturally virtuous, they are not naturally moral.

All these things come by development, by evolution, by necessity. All governments, from the crudest to the most enlightened, come from a desire for self-preservation. Men stand publicly for principles that in private life they ignore. Thousands advocate honesty, but practice dishonesty. The law must be just, even if the law makers are unjust. During all the ages the goal to which mankind have been striving, is the perfect society—a society in which justice, mercy and righteousness shall prevail. Will it ever be attained? The optimist says yes—the pessimist says no. The question is now no nearer solution than it was in the farthererst ages past. "Behind the suns, rest suns in the farthest sky. Their distant ray these thousands of years has been flying toward the tiny earth and has reached it not."

THE NEW AGE.

[John Ruskin (1919-1900), the art critic, lecturer, and author, was always intensely interested in religious and social questions. This poem, written when he was 47 years of age, reflects the spirit of his letters and lectures on industrial and social questions as in his "Fors Clavigera." His simplest and best known writings are in "Sesame and Lilies" and "Crown of Wild Olives."]

Awake! awake! the stars are pale, the east is russet gray;
They fade, behold the phantoms fade,
that kept the gates of Day;
Throw wide the burning valves, and let the golden streets be free;
The morning watch is past—the watch of evening shall not be.

Put off, put off your mail, ye kings,
and beat your brands to dust;
A surer grasp your hands must know,
your hearts a better trust;
Nay, bend aback the lance's point, and break the helmet bar—
A noise is on the morning winds, but not the noise of war!
Among the grassy mountain paths the glittering troops increase:
They come! they come! how fair their feet; they come that publish peace!
Yea, Victory! fair Victory! our enemies, and ours,
And all the clouds are clasped in light and all the earth with flowers.

Ah! still depressed and dim with dew,
but yet a little while,
And radiant with the deathless rose
the wilderness shall smile,
And every tender living thing shall feed by streams of rest,
Nor lamb shall from the fold be lost,
nor nursling from the nest.

For aye, the time of wrath is past, and near the time of rest,
And honor binds the brow of man,
and faithfulness his breast—
Behold, the time of wrath is past, and righteousness shall be,
And the Wolf is dead in Arcady, and the Dragon in the sea!

Must Join Church to Get Salvation.

But Very Few Great Thinkers Are Church Members.

"I affirm that you must join the church to be saved," said Rev. W. A. Moore last night in his sermon at the revival meetings in the First Baptist church.

He declared that the Bible demands it. God has established the church as the means to salvation, and the redemption of the world is to be made through the church.

He declared one cannot be obedient to Christ and not join the church, and denied that a man can be a Christian and remain outside the organized church.

He said all the good outside of the church was because of the church.—Tacoma (Wash.) Daily Times.

The above statement was made by one of the leading and most popular clergymen of Tacoma, as reported by the Times. If the orthodox religion is true, then Rev. W. A. Moore is correct, and every man and woman who is not a member of a church is doomed to endless torture. Rev. Mr. Moore is a Christian (Campbellite) minister. That church teaches that baptism by immersion is essential to salvation. Now, if this doctrine is true, then Plato, Aristotle, Galileo and Bruno, and nearly all the great characters of ancient times are in hell, and Benjamin Franklin, Thomas Jefferson, John Adams, Charles Sumner, Lloyd Garrison, Wendell Phillips, Horace Greeley, Lincoln, Darwin, Huxley, Spencer, and thousands of philosophers, statesmen, poets, inventors, scholars and philanthropists—all benefactors of the race—of modern times, are also inhabiting the regions of unutterable woe, and shall be kept there forever because they did not join a church and be baptized.

Just think of it! Lincoln in hell, Wilkes Booth in heaven! Nearly all the old Abolitionists in the burning pit, while most of the pious old slaveholders are praising the Lamb of God before the great white throne.

A few years ago Theodore Durant brutally outraged two young girls and then murdered them. He was a Baptist. He is singing glad hallelujahs to the Savior in heaven. The girls had never been baptized. They shall be roasted in fire and brimstone throughout eternity.

Harry Orchard confesses that he murdered twenty-three human beings and committed all the other crimes in the catalogue. He would contract to kill a man for $25. He has been baptized into the church, and says when he dies he is sure of going right up in a high seat in heaven where he will be given a crown. The unbaptized men whom he killed shall be tortured forever because they neglected to join a church.

It is proper to remark in this connection that our Presbyterian, Episcopalian and Methodist friends say that a baptism by sprinkling a tablespoonful of water on the head will do; that God won't damn you if you have a preacher do that, providing he repeats the proper words when he does it; but our Campbellite and Baptist brethren solemnly tell us that will not do. The "candidate for salvation" must be chucked right down into a pond; and "the water must flow clear over him," otherwise the baptism don't take. It behooves one to be very careful right here. A shallow dip, one lacking by one-half an inch what God requires, would not insure salvation, and the candidate would be sent to hell for having failed to obey the commands by one-half or one-quarter of an inch.

But Brother Moore further says: "All the good outside of the church is because of the church."

Now, is that true? Let us see. The church taught that the world is flat, and denounced all the early scientists as heretics and infidels.

It spilled rivers of blood in wars waged against other people.

It defended kings and tyrants, who perpetrated unspeakable atrocities.

It taught and practiced polygamy and slavery.

It imprisoned, tortured and burned to death thousands of reformers.

It denounced the inventors of printing as imps of the devil.

It imprisoned Galileo and burned Bruno, Servetus and other scientists and philosophers.

It denounced education as a subtle decree of Satan, and taught that the chief aim of man should be to save his soul.

It hanged and burned ignorant old women as witches.

It vehemently denounced as wicked infidels our Revolutionary Fathers who sought to establish this Republic.

It said the Declaration of Independence was heretical, and the United States constitution was Christless and Godless.

It championed negro slavery in America which it said was a divine institution, and it declared that Garrison, Phillips, Sumner and other Abolitionists, were dangerous infidels.

It vigorously opposed the practice of women who had the audacity to uncover their heads in church, and said the Bible commanded women to keep silent, and if she wanted to know anything, let her ask her husband.

It said that Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Susan B. Anthony and other woman-rights advocates, were heretics, and for many years it slandered and persecuted these great women.

It denounced in the infancy of those sciences, astronomy, chemistry, philosophy and geology; the church said they all lead to infidelity.

It viciously assailed Darwin for advocating the doctrine of evolution, and even to this date in the blaze of civilization, the church sits in a sullen attitude toward that great scientific truth.

The church looks for all its wisdom in the teachings of the past. Science looks to the future to reveal still more knowledge.

Ever and anon an open-minded churchman, a Thomas, a Swing, a Briggs, Myron Reed, turns from the musty records of a remote past, and catching the gleams of the light of a coming age, they are pounced down upon by the church and are expelled from it as heretics.

But is not the orthodox church advancing?

Yes, slowly, but never of its own accord. It has been FORCED to advance. Inch by inch has it been driven forward by the men whom it has denounced as heretics.

There was a time when the church provided the prison, the thumb-screws and the fagot, for the man or woman who dared to dispute the doctrines of a "war in heaven;" the fall of man; the personality of a devil who had thwarted God's original plans; a virgin-born God; the vicarious blood atonement through which wicked monsters could escape merited punishment; an endless hell; the saving of souls by water baptism; the miraculous changing of bread and wine into the actual flesh and blood of Jesus Christ, by the utterance of a few words by a priest, and other theological contentions now known to be borrowed from ancient pagan superstitions.

Let every true lover of his kind rejoice that old orthodoxy is doomed. She is hoary with paganistic teachings and bloody crimes.

All honor to the heretics in the church and outside of it—to the Spiritualists, the Universalists, the Unitarians, the Theosophists, the Christian Scientists, the New Thoughtists, the Agnostics and Free Thinkers, and to the common schools for the glorious work they have done in dissipating the dismal fogs of old orthodoxy.

In the ratio that these old paganistic, soul-dwarfing church dogmas recede and lose their influence on the minds of men and women, in that same ratio do they become more intelligent and more truly religious.

Brother Moore is mistaken. But very few great thinkers are church members, and these few were suspected of heresy by the church. Nearly all the noted scientists, inventors, philosophers and reformers were regarded as heretics by the clergy of their day.

Michigan State Spiritualists' Association Grove Mass-Meeting.

It affords me great pleasure to announce that there is 'something doing' amongst the Spiritualists in Michigan. A Mass-meeting, including one week and two Sundays, will soon be in session at Grand Rapids, Mich., with some of the best talent on the Spiritualist rostrum in attendance. This will be held under the auspices of the State Spiritualist Association, and will be in the form of a grove meeting, the location to be the old camp ground north of this city, known as Briggs Park, over which in times past the beautiful banner of Spiritualism was floated, and whose woods have echoed with the voices of many of our leaders, calling men away from the dark ages of superstition, pointing them to the path of spiritual progress, to think and reason, and grow.

This meeting will be held June 7 to 14 inclusive, and we wish to extend an invitation to Spiritualists in all parts of the state to visit Grand Rapids at this time and assist us in making this meeting not only a success, but one that will enrich our lives for the time to come.

Following is a list of speakers, whom we expect to have with us, comprising an array of talent that is seldom brought together outside of the national meetings: Mr. and Mrs. E. (W. Sprague, Detroit; Will J. Erwood, Battle Creek, Mich.; Dr. Geo. B. Warne, President N. S. A., Chicago; Mrs. D. A. Morrell, Mrs. Amanda Coffman, Dr. J. C. Batdorf, Mrs. Belle Fuller, Grand Rapids, Mich. We also hope to have Mrs. Abbie Sheets of Grand Ledge upon our program. The president and vice-president of the M. S. S. A. expect to be omnipresent and assist when occasion requires.

A hearty invitation is extended not only to Michigan Spiritualists, but to any who might wish to make us a call at this time. Remember the dates. June 7 to 14 inclusive.

THE OLD HOME.

Back am I within the cottage
Where my life was first begun,
Where my eyes first opened wildly
On the gleaming morning sun.
Years have swept away my childhood,
Years so filled with sweet delight,
That their passage takes me distant
From my childhood's golden light.

Bygone days are sweetest to me,
But their gems are all but flown,
Still I'm plodding down Life's highway
Broken-hearted, sad, alone.
These same years which swept me onward,
Wrecked the home once bright with cheer;
Moldering, crumbling, now at ruin,
Is the place to me so dear.

Cobwebs form the dusky draperies
Of each empty window pane,
And I startle at the echo,
As I tread these boards again
Moldered paper cover ceiling,
Floor and walls and all alike,
While the shadows fill the corner,
Once by childish faces bright.

Tho' I live within a palace,
Hoarded wealth at my command,
And young voices, fresh and merry,
Ring through halls both arched and grand—
Still my heart turns ever fondly
In pleasure, joy or misery,
To the dear, deserted homestead,
And the times of "used-to-be."

Regain Your Eyesight

A Remarkably Successful Home Treatment That Seldom Fails.

Costs Less Than a Single Fee of a First Class Specialist.

Cold printed words cannot describe the wonderful merits of the "Actina," treatment for all forms of eye troubles. You must see it, examine it, and use it for a time before you can form a just opinion of its true value.

We can supply you with all the evidence the most skeptical person could exact that the "Actina" treatment has and does remove cataracts, granulations, and most all other causes of eye disfigurement and impaired eye sight. We can also show you plenty of evidence from former patients that the "Actina" treatment has cured many stubborn eye diseases of ten to fifteen years standing, even after prominent specialists had pronounced them as being incurable.

Besides all this evidence we will gladly send you our treatment, with full directions, which you can thoroughly test for two weeks. If at the end of that time you do not feel that you have been benefited, or if for any other reason you do not wish to take the treatment longer, send it back and no charge will be made.

The "Actina" treatment is so simple and so logical in construction and application that it at once appeals to the common-sense mind, as well as to the scientific. There is no cutting nor drugging—simply apply to the afflicted parts and the scientifically produced vapor currents will relieve the congestion, perfect the circulation, so that Nature may cure the disease. Not only will the one "Actina" appliance remove the cause of trouble, but it will strengthen the eyes so that spectacles may be entirely abandoned in many instances. One instrument can be used by the entire family and will last for years.

The germ-destroying and health-producing vapors generated in the "Actina" will penetrate the innermost organs of the head; therefore, as a relief for catarrh, hay fever, bronchitis, deafness and all other ailments produced by cold and catarrhal deposits "Actina" has no equal.

Permit us to send you a copy of our 64-page book, which illustrates and describes the cause and relief of diseases of the eye, ear, nose, throat and head. It will interest you, and is fully worth the postal card that will bring it. Address Actina Appliance Co., Dept. 342P, 811 Walnut St., Kansas City, Mo.

Rev. Sophia B. Seip, president O. S. S. Association, lecturer and platform test medium, desires a change. She will answer calls in any state, or at camps for a short or long period. Address her at No. 302 Alisky building, Portland, Ore.

P. A. Norman writes from Tacoma, Wash.: "I cannot find words to express my gratitude and high esteem of The Progressive Thinker, and of the many brothers and sisters who are contributors to it. Go forward as you are, striving to uphold the good cause, but expose the frauds, and commercial humbugs which interfere more with the progress in the true philosophy of Spiritualism than all other drawbacks combined. Why should not tricksters or psychical frauds be justly dealt with, and punished as severely as any other class of counterfeiters and frauds who seek to obtain money under false pretenses."

W. R. Cooper writes: "It is very evident that Mrs. Brockway is used by the spirit forces to clinch most of her messages and tests in a way that the most skeptical mind must stop and consider the evidence of what they hear. Her closing meeting on May 31 would do credit to the Cause of Spiritualism in any city or country on this old earth. The hall at 3514 Vincennes avenue was simply jammed; at least as many as 400 witnessed the splendid work of Mrs. Brockway, and also enjoyed the musical and lecture program. I understand the Brockways leave within a few days on an extended trip West, but will return and be in the harness again early in September."

Rev. H. C. Dorn, state organizer, writes from 72 Columbus street, Newark, N. J.: "The First Church of Spiritualism holds its meetings on the corner of West Park and Broad streets, every Sunday evening, Rev. H. C. Dorn being assisted by Brother E. Mettack, formerly of Trenton, Brother Adams, formerly of Philadelphia, Pa., and by Brother O. A. Beebe, Norwich, Conn. The services are well attended. Any one interested in Spiritualism can communicate with me concerning organization, as I have been appointed state organizer by the N. S. A. The society at Paterson is doing good work. It has had very interesting meetings during the fall, winter and spring, but has closed up during the summer. The writer had the pleasure of visiting that society Sunday, May 10, when Mrs. N. T. Brigham occupied the rostrum, and her lecture was grand. On that date the society held a business meeting in regard to a Dr. Von Kensler and Mrs. Von Kensler, and it will be wise for all societies and all Spiritualists who intend to do business with them, to write to the secretary of the Paterson society, A. Roberts, 17 Southard street, Paterson, N. J. It may save trouble."

Mrs. Landsborough writes from Toronto Junction, Canada, speaking favorably of the lecture and spirit messages given there by Mrs. Dr. Lang, of Buffalo, N. Y.

Julius Wagner writes: "At the Church of Life, Grand Army hall, West Diamond, Allegheny, Pa., we had splendid meeting and tests. The writer read a poem entitled "Spirit Return," his own production. Mr. Wise, a local medium, is doing wonderful. He is improving very rapidly of late. The meetings are well attended. The evenings are devoted entirely to spirit messages."

Mrs. Margaret Gaule-Riedinger writes from New York: "Friday afternoon, May 29, a very successful season closed the Ladies' Aid, auxiliary to the First Association of New York City; thirty ladies were present. The report of the burial fund was read and accepted. Mrs. Elmer Hand was secretary pro tem, Mrs. Newton being absent. The report of the regular fund was read by Miss Gaule, treasurer, and accepted. Great satisfaction was the exclamation of all present, that the season was so profitable and such good work accomplished. The enthusiasm of the ladies was manifested in October last, the opening month, and they then determined to put forth great efforts to make a fund to buy the plot and bury the poor. The success has been phenomenal, and in closing we have a fine cash balance on hand. The president then adjourned the meeting until next season with kind and appreciative words to her people. Mrs. George R. Storm, president; Mrs. Elmer Hand, vice-president; Mrs. Mary A. Newton, secretary; Mrs. Margaret Gaule-Reidinger, treasurer; Mrs. Milton Rathbon, chairman trustees."

Mrs. Will J. Saile writes from Columbus, O.: "The First Spiritualists' Temple, Columbus, Ohio, has closed for the season. Mrs. D. A. Morrill, of Grand Rapids, Mich., occupied the rostrum the last two months. This is the third time that this remarkable medium has served the people at the Stone Church. She is not alone a fine lecture medium, but a splendid message bearer. Mr. and Mrs. Morrill have so endeared themselves to us that we have again secured their services for the coming season. The people at the Temple have organized, and the following officers have been elected for the coming season: President, Mrs. Will Saile; vice-president, Mr. C. Parsons; secretary, Mrs. E. B. Eubanks; treasurer, Mr. Will Saile; trustees, Mrs. Will Truesdale, Mr. F. A. Chenaweth and Mr. E. B. Eubanks."

J. Madison Allen lectured in Decatur, Ill., May 24, 28, 31, June 3. The two organizations have unitedly secured an excellent hall. Prof. Allen will be pleased to visit neighboring localities between Sundays. Address at once.

The sixth grand picnic will be given by the Spiritualists' Society Light and Truth, assisted by the singing society, "Eintracht," on Sunday, June 28, 1908, at Hoerdt's grove, 2 E. Belmont avenue, Chicago, Ill. Bowling, footraces and all kinds of amusements for young and old. Western, Clybourn and Belmont avenue cars run direct to the grove. Everybody welcome. Tickets, 25 cents a person.

Mrs. Laura G. Fixen writes: "All Spiritualists and their friends, and friends' friends, are cordially invited to join the Sunflower Club and spend the fourth of July at Lake Bluff. Take the Northwestern Elevated, Evanston branch, to Evanston; fare 10 cents; thence the Milwaukee Electric to Lake Bluff. Round trip, 40 cents; time 52 minutes. Cars run every 15 minutes. A fine program has been prepared. Bring your lunch. Coffee will be served free of charge. Bring your family and friends. Come early, and have a good time. A special brand of fine weather has been reserved for the occasion."

J. E. B. Dillon writes: "The Compounce Association of Spiritualists will hold its forty-fourth annual picnic at Compounce, Lake, Bristol, Conn., Wednesday, June 17. Business meeting at 10 a. m. Conference at 11 a. m. and 1:30 p. m.: Mrs. May S. Pepper-Vanderbilt will lecture and also give messages. Music will be rendered by the Arion Male Quartette of Hartford."

On Sunday, May 31, Oscar A. Edgerly concluded a two months' engagement with the Spiritual Fraternity of Ayer's Temple, Boston, Mass. That Mr. Edgerly's guides won the approbation of his listeners is indicated by the fact that he is re-engaged to speak at the Temple for the months of April and May, 1909. His engagements as made for the season of 1908 and 1909 are as follows: During June and July he will fill engagements at Unity camp, Saugus, Mass.; Lake Brady camp, Ohio, and Lily Dale camp, New York. During August he will serve Grand Ledge camp, Michigan, and Chesterfield camp, Indiana. During September he will serve the Ladies' Spiritual Temple Fund Society of Cleveland, Ohio. October is engaged with the Fraternal Order of Spiritualists of Chicago, Ill. November and December, 1908, and January, 1909, are still open for engagement. During February and March, Mr. Edgerly will serve the Southern Cassadaga camp, Lake Helen, Florida. In April and May he will serve the Spiritual Fraternity at Ayer's Temple, Boston, Mass. Mr. Edgerly will be pleased to hear from societies desiring to employ trance speaker for one or more of the months of November and December, 1908, and January, 1909. Permanent address, 42 Smith street, Lynn, Mass."

Mrs. Maggie Henry writes: "Our audience was not as large as usual in Universal Occult Society hall at 77 E. 31st street, but what we lacked was made up in harmony. All were interested in Mr. Harry Burgess' short lecture on the Indians. All enjoyed examining his Indian clay pipe at the close of the meeting. Prof. Leon gave some very fine messages. We were all glad to welcome Dr. Temple to give messages. Madam Lucille Le Loux gave messages, as well as your correspondent. Dr. Temple will be with us next Sunday."

O. L. Harvey writes: "A question is often asked, "Is Spiritualism a Religion?" Of course it is, or should be. If not a religion, it could be of little worth to some of us. If it were not, I would make supreme efforts to make it so. Religion is the highest, holiest, divinest attribute of man's nature, and why should he be ashamed of it? The word religion has two definitions: One is confined to rites, ceremonies, theological belief; the other is deep-seated, heartfelt love to God and man, righteousness, purity, judgment, all that make and sustain a noble life. It includes all that is beautiful, good and true. It shows us our right relations to things in this life and the life to come."

The well known medium, Isa Wilson Kayner, is now located at 1054 Tenth street, San Diego, Cal.

Mrs. Hattie F. R. Peet, corresponding secretary, writes: "A large number of members and friends of the Band of Harmony met at the home of Mrs. Dexter on Thursday, June 4, the occasion being the second of the "Summer Socials" given under the auspices of the Band of Harmony. Our pastor, Mrs. Richmond, being with us, delightful instruction along spiritual lines was given by Ouina, followed by a poem on "The Lilies" and "Sunshine and Shadow." Coffee and lunch were served at 6 p. m., and in the evening a fine musical program was provided by the children of our hostess, and these were much applauded; readings by the tiny grandson, followed by a game of progressive euchre. The third of our series of "Summer Socials" will be held at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Richmond, 3802 Ridge Boulevard, Rogers Park, on Thursday afternoon and evening, June 18. Ladies will bring lunch for themselves and friends; coffee served at 5 p. m. There will be interesting exercises in the afternoon, and progressive euchre in the evening for those desiring to play. Score cards, 25 cents; coffee checks, 10 cents. All are cordially invited; none can afford to miss this gathering, in their beautiful suburban home."

Mr. Letford, the drummer medium, was in the city last week. He has engagements at various camps, among which is Lily Dale.

Dr. G. B. Warne lectured at Wheeling, W. Va., on Sunday, May 24, to a large and deeply interested audience.

C. A. Sollinger, secretary of the Ohio State Spiritualist Association, writes: "The new officers are: Harry E. Boerstler, president; Miss Elizabeth Harlow, first vice-president; Mrs. Elizabeth Schauss, second vice-president; C. A. Sollinger, secretary; S. W. Mahaffey, treasurer; trustees, Fred D. Dunakin, Del. A. Herrick, Mrs. Hattie G. Webster and Mrs. L. A. Wilson.

Mrs. C. Bergere writes: "The Fraternal Daughters will hold, during their summer meetings, every fourth Wednesday of the month, a series of Mother Goose entertainments. The first one will be held at the home of Mrs. C. Bergere, 508 Larchmont avenue. Take large car on Lincoln avenue to Larchmont avenue. Supper will be served from 6 to 7:30 p. m. come early and bring your friends and have the best time you ever had."

Hon. R. A. Dague, an occasional correspondent of this paper, and wife, have returned to their home at Tacoma, Wash. For the past six months they have been visiting relatives and friends in Colorado, Nebraska and Iowa. Senator Dague's home address is 815 North Fife street, Tacoma, Wash.

W. E. Hart, trumpet medium, is open for engagements. Prof. W. F. Peck claims that Mr. Hart is capable of doing excellent work. Address him for engagements at 409 West Third street, Joplin, Mo.

Mr. and Mrs. L. Anderson write from Quincy, Ill.: "Charles Barnes, the trumpet medium, visited our city, and while here was entertained at our home at 203 N. 8th street, and while there gave several very interesting seances, and the many friends of the family had the pleasure of communicating with their dear ones that had passed to the spirit side of life. There were a few skeptics in the circle who had their eyes opened to a great extent. We hope the time will soon roll around when we can have Brother Barnes with us again."

H. Hegdahl writes of missionary work in Minnesota as follows: "At Long Lake, Minn., I found good work being done; a Lyceum started for the young, with a class conducted for old and young folks. The workers and teachers are young in years, and full of spirit and energy, expressing the soul's sincere wishes. The children love to attend, and parents come with them to see what goes on. After the lessons the young recite their pieces, which is interesting for the old folks also. Minnesota needs more missionary work and workers; one thing especially is needed—more money to do this work. When the orthodox devil is removed from the minds, then the pocket books is sealed up tight. Keep the devil before men, and they will pay in spite of all other necessities of life. There are always some willing workers and contributors who carry the burdens of the many. Wake up, dear friends, and make this your religion, and help the state officers who are struggling to do something for humanity. This is your cause. Come, let us work hand in hand. More of fellowship is needed; more of co-operation, more of brotherhood among men. I had meetings in Princeton May 26 and 27, and a test circle conducted in the afternoon of the 27th. Maple Plain has a few Spiritualists, but all is quiet there. I am trying to establish home circles as I go along, but it seems rather hard to get friends interested. Most people judge time by dollars and cents. "How much will this or that bring me?" The soul and spiritual gain are set aside until some other time, which may never come. I am at this time at Miloca, Minn. Here are also a few who know something of spirit return."

Mrs. Dr. Caird, Corresponding Secretary, writes:—The Illinois Sunflower Club wil hold a business meeting at Lincoln Hall, 70 East Adams, Tuesday, June 9. This will be the only opportunity the members will have to discuss and make arrangements for the picnic to take place July 4, at Lake Bluff. The next tea-party will be held June 23, at the same Hall. Good mediums have been secured. Be sure to come and bring your friends. These meetings will continue through the summer."

The Social and Entertainment to be held at the home of Dr. Burgess on the 16th has been postponed till further annnouncement. The Dr. is called away on that date, and will be obliged to emporarily disappoint all those anticipating such a good time.

MY BOY'S QUESTION.

"Mamma," said Willie, and earnestly raised
His blue-brown eyes to mine,
"Tell me the grandest sights you've seen;
Not pretty, you know, but fine."

"Darling," I answered, "what can I say?
Grand sights so many there are,
In this glorious world in which we live,
That we need not journey far."

"A mountain is grand with its snow-capped top
Rearing its head to the sky,
And a deep ravine with rugged sides,
And waters rushing by.

"This world has beauty everywhere;
Birds, bees, and flowers most fine,
Trees bending low with golden fruit,
And falls where limpid waters shine.

"The ocean with its vast domain,
Its wavelets murmuring evermore;
The sky, the moon, stars diadem—
And pebbles, on the sandy shore.

"But the most beautiful sight
That mamma has ever seen
Is the sun rising over the sea
In golden glitter and sheen.

"And the dearest, most beloved,
That daily entrances me,
Is the upturned face of my precious boy
As he stands beside my knee."

He now has crossed the silent strand,
And viewed that landscape o'er;
His feet hath pressed the shimmering sands
Where love unites to part no more.

He often has returned to me,
And told me of that world so fair,
His eyes were beaming tenderness
With heaven's soft presence everywhere.

A NOTABLE EVENT.

It Stands Out Bold and Clear Among Great Events.

Standing out bold and clear among the many great events that marked the phenomenal progress of humanity the world over during the nineteenth century is one, the sixtieth anniversary of which was celebrated in Seneca Falls, New York, May 26, 27 and 28 of this year. In that city in July, 1848, was held the first organized meeting ever held by women in the world's history, to demand equal participation in the framing of laws and all other matters concerning the welfare of the people. The meeting was called by Elizabeth Cady Stanton and Lucretia Mott, and was attended by many prominent men and women from different parts of the country, among them the great orator and statesman, Frederick Douglass.

The resolution passed at that meeting was the clarion cry that, before the century had closed, was to ring in every civilized country in the world, rousing women from their lethargy of the ages; awakening them to the gross injustice of their position in the world; of the extreme cruelty of many of the laws enacted concerning them, particularly those which related to property or other rights.

That the women of the world are aroused to the importance of securing their just rights is evidenced by the battle they are so strenuously waging in the United States, England, conservative Germany, France, and the Latin nations. Even in Turkey, India, China, and Japan they have taken up the agitation. In Finland, New Zealand, Australia, and several of our own states they have already secured full rights to the elective franchise.

The exercises at Seneca Falls was attended by thousands of men and women coming from different parts of the country, and a number from Europe. The principal event of the exercises was the unveiling on Wednesday afternoon of a large bronze tablet, commemorating the first meeting. The tablet was placed on the outer wall of the church building that now occupies the ground where stood the old Wesleyan chapel where the meeting was held in 1848.

On one side of the tablet, modeled in exquisite relief, stands a graceful, earnest and intelligent looking woman dressed in the fashion in vogue at that period. Her right arm hangs restfully at the side, the hand holding the paper on which was written the call for the meeting. The left arm is extended and the hand holds a wreath over a smaller tablet on which is inscribed the following:

"On this spot stood the Wesleyan Chapel where the first Woman's Rights Convention in the world's history was held, July 19 and 20, 1848. At that meeting Elizabeth Cady Stanton moved the following resolution, which was seconded by Frederick Douglass, Resolved, That it is the duty of the women of this country to secure to themselves the sacred right to the elective franchise."

The tablet is considered by many critics to be the finest that has been made in this country in a long time, resembling in many ways the work of the late gifted Saint Gaudens. It was modeled by Elizabeth St. John Matthews, the sculptor, of New York City.

Mrs. Matthews was the woman member of the International Jury of Awards on Sculpture at the St. Louis Exposition, and is the first and only woman to be given this honor in any country. She has done many notable works of art, some of which have given her an international reputation. Her busts of Presidents Lincoln, McKinley and Roosevelt, Chaplain McCabe, and Cardinal Gibbons, and the bas-reliefs of Elizabeth Cady Stanton, and Lucretia Mott, Frances Willard, Susan B. Anthony, the latter taken from sittings given by Miss Anthony, and Mrs. Croly (Jennie June), the founder of women's clubs, have received high praise.

THAT ELGIN PICNIC.

Will Be Held SUNDAY, JUNE 21, 1908

Do not forget the Picnic to be held at Elgin, under the auspices of the State Association and the Chicago Spiritualists' League. Everybody will enjoy this trip, the fresh air, the feast of reason and feast of the appetite, that always awaits them on these occasions at Elgin. This is to be established as an annual picnic, and should be the coming event of the season's opening. Good speeches and good messages—the ever-welcome spirit-messages will be a part of the order of the day, and the Children's Lyceum will receive its share of attention, and the children themselves—well they will be the guests of honor, and will enjoy the attentions to be given them, no doubt. Keep this in your memory: All must provide a lunch for themselves and the children. Coffee will be furnished on the grounds by the ladies of Elgin. The society is as one in the preparation for the reception of our people, for they know this means an interesting and profitable day for Spiritualists and Spiritualism. Take all the lunch you can carry—you will not need to carry any of it back home with you in your hand.

P. S.—In order to go in a "bunch," let all who are going to the picnic be at the Fifth Avenue Terminal of the Aurora & Elgin Electric Railway at from 9 to 10 a. m. Trains start at 9:20, 9:50, 10:20 and 1050. All should start as early as 10:20, to get to Elgin 11:57, at the latest. Dinner will be served pretty soon after the 11:57 train. Be prompt at the station between 9 and 10 a. m. Six-ride tickes for $5, is the best rate that can be had, and people will please "bunch up," for the occasion.

TRUTH.

Love Thy Neighbor as Thyself and Thou Shalt Know the Truth.

The true inwardness of things has a great attraction for the human soul living on this earth. Its only means of inquiry consists of 5 bodily, quite material senses. The impressions it receives through these teach it little by little that the world without is a chain of causality, and all whatever point it may direct its investigation, it finds ever one link after another, leading it always further from the starting point, but never arriving at a conclusive or basic idea which will explain the meaning of the manifestations it finds itself living among.

The chief reason of this is that the range of vibratory perception through our five senses is exceedingly limited, and the manifestations they thus bring us in contact with are only a small portion of the evolution lying behind and beyond them, most of which is thus lost to us. No wonder we find difficulty in reconstructing the whole body, when all that comes under our perception is, comparatively speaking, one pore of the skin!

If we would come nearer to the TRUTH, then we must evidently increase the range of our perception of the various vibratory manifestations of force and mateer.

How can this be done?

As the quotation says, by applying the Golden Rule in our daily actions.

Where is the connection? you may ask.

Let us see.

Before we can follow this rule completely, we must have analyzed our tendencies of character and applied the working of them to our own individual development. According to the completeness with which we do this, we acquire a habit of concentrated introspection which causes our perception to grow from within. This is exactly opposite to the method we have been exclusively following, of ever turning our perceptive faculties outward.

As our perception thus grows, relations of life which formerly seemed complicated, assume a single aspect, and we are led to realize what the so-called abstract laws of human intercourse and development really mean and to judge correctly according to them.

This will be the first effect of following this underlying rule of life, and at this point, the inquiring soul will have gained much in serenity and happiness. It will find, however, its constant query as to the why, the whence and the whither, still unanswered. For this, dear reader, is the main truth we are promised we shall know through following the golden precept.

This truth, when once indelibly fixed in our material earthly perception, will give us the key to the meaning of the world we live in.

This truth, including, as it does, a knowledge of the path ahead of us, must needs be imparted to us by those who have already traveled that road. Our habit of concentrated introspection, when faithfully carried out, will sooner or later lead us to take heed of still voices from outside our personality and those whose material bodies are more happily attuned to these influences from higher vibratory planes, will soon receive full explanation of conditions there, and thus come to know the path beyond and pass their priceless knowledge on to those around them!

This is merely bringing to the consciousness of our material brain a part of the far greater and wider reach of activity of the indwelling soul which is using the said body as its instrument of expression or burial, as the case only too often is in this bright and interesting world of causality and new experience. It is, in other words, training the body to perceive the full vibratory range the indwelling soul has already mastered.

Eight years ago he requested the writer to speak at his funeral if he died first. His wish was complied with.

All Day Meeting in Los Angeles.

The People's Spiritual Society held one of its all day meetings on May 31. The early morning, from 9:30 to 10:30, was devoted to healing and message circles, Dr. Green, leader. At 10:30 meeting opened with song by the president and wife, after which Dr. Capps delivered a lecture, subject, "Spiritualism and Orthodoxy." The Doctor brought to light many thoughts of sterling worth. Mrs. Addie Smith-McMillen followed with a few remarks, giving an inspirational poem, subject given by the audience. Refreshments were then served under the managements of Mrs. Nettie Howell, whose mission seems to be to make everybody happy. Mrs. Sanford Johnson gave messages and psychometric readings.

At 2:30 Mr. William Hodge, of San Diego, made an interesting address. Mrs. Nicholas Cobb gave messages. A message circle was formed and the local mediums took charge. All day the spacious hall was well filled and the feeling of harmony and and good will to man marked another victory for our glorious Cause.

These monthly meetings are doing a great good whereby those seeking can find the light which illuminates our pathway.

OUT OF THE DEEPS.

There are no isms; 'tis one with all,
And all is one, a speaking force
Telling in form the only source
Of full expression; Creation's call

Of part to its part, component wise,
The deeper meanings of life to tell,
The higher way of the gods to spell,
As the wheel of invention swiftly flies.

Over and over the tale is told,
Yet how few can hear the accents fine,
How few are attuned to the rhythm and rhyme
And know that the story is ages old.

Pure are the streams from th' unfailing fount,
Keen are the airs from celestial hills,
Swift is the thought that most deeply thrills,
And varied the steps by which we mount.

Never a loss but a gain is near;
Never a sorrow and never a pain
But the birth of a power comes on amain
And its shine is about us strong and clear.

Wide are the fields of our consciousness,
Full are the stores of our inward strength,
And life reaches out in infinite length
As we onward in diligence daily press.

Never a pause; 'tis a ceaseless beat
Of the Omnipulse in its purpose grand,
Holding the whole in unbroken band
With many a task seeming incomplete.

Never a time to say "'tis done,"
Each height discloses some broader view;
The more accomplished shows more to do;
One work scarce ends till another's begun.

This is the way of the universe,
Suns and planets and stars and earths,
Life ever moving in deaths and births,
Always for better, not ever for worse.

Say it is God, if it pleases best;
Say it is Good is the better way,—
Blessed the knowledge of this our day,
For it gives to the soul such sense of rest.

Live in the fullness from day to day,
Live in the beauties of harmony;
Oneness in allness and ever to be
A springtime of bliss, an eternal May.

LIFE'S PROGRESSION.

They are a challenge to the orthodox world, and through all of its pages runs this challenge to those whose ideas of God, of heaven, of hell, of a future life are based strictly upon the Bible. Yet the author, Edward C. Randall, believes in life hereafter, based on positive knowledge given him from the living friends passed to the life beyond. Price $1.50.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

This department is under the management of
HUDSON TUTTLE.
Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Everyone has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected. St. M.—Q.—What is the number of the stars visible? Do any disappear?

A.—The unassisted eye is said to be able to discover 5,000. With a telescope the number increases with the mystifying power, until it is estimated that the best reveal 40,000,000 to 50,000,000. This by no means is the limit. A better instrument, reaching farther away, would bring a new firmament of stars into view. When a great telescope is directed to a nebulous spot scarcely visible to the eye, the whisp of cloud is resolved into a swarm of stars, a system of suns of itself. The outer rim of the universe has never been reached. No plummet has sounded its depths. There are always stars beyond. The distance to these stars brought to view by the highest power of the telescope is quite incomprehensible. It can only be measured by terms of light, the swiftest messenger of nature. It leaps 192,000 miles in a second, or 1,520,000 miles in a minute. It can reach the earth from the sun in eight minutes. Yet the nearest of the stars, granting those of the first magnitude to be the nearest, according to Struve, the eminent German astronomer, are distant from the earth thirty-two light years; that is across the gulf of space between it requires thirty-two years for light to pass, and were they instantly destroyed it would be thirty-two years before the light leaving them reached us, or we would not know of their destruction until the end of that time. For light to pass from stars of the sixteenth magnitude, which is about the telescopic limit of visibility, requires 24,192 years. Such distances are incomprehensible. It is with difficulty we grasp a million, and the next period of a billion, is as unrealizable as a thousand billions.

In this incomprehensible abyss our sun with its planets is one of the stars. Our earth is a mote of dust, swung in the void, one of the infinite host. The contemplation of the sublime infinitude overwhelms us with a sense of our littleness, and insignificance. We are crushed by the sense of over-mastering forces. Yet the human mind as the last product of world-building, may assure itself, arise unawed by the contemplation, for it proves its kinship to the Supreme force which has utilized all other forces into an harmonious unit, by its comprehension of these forces, and ability to unravel the mathematics of the heavens.

Gravitation cannot extend its arm so far that the mind of man cannot compute the strength of its clutch by which it holds, and casts the orbs along their orbits. The mind is able to arise to the primal source of things, and by its comprehension demonstrate itself an individualization of the cosmic mind.

Have star worlds perished?

Fearful accounts of dying, dead and burned up stars have been contributed to the world's pessimistic literature.

It pleased the pseudo astronomer to be able to throw this sop to the religionist and thus support his superstition that the world would "come to an end" and be burned up. It is now known that such "burning stars" were imaginary. There are many stars that have periods of brilliancy. This increases to a certain limit and then slowly decreases. The time is often measured by many years. When a star yet scarcely visible thus comes into view, astronomers are too willing to gain notoriety by being credited with its discovery. It goes on increasing in brilliancy until it reaches the maximum of light, and then decreases until lost in the swarm of undiscernible stars. Then the "popular scientists" write horrible accounts of a burning sun, and utterly destroyed world-system.

Since anything like accurate observation has been made, there never has been a new star appear or one destroyed. There never has been the least observable change in any manner in the order of the world. The lugubrious prophecies of the Jeremiahs of destruction and calamities, have one and all proved only the ignorance of their exponents, and credulity of their followers. The sun rises to the thousandth part of a second as it did a million years ago; it will rise exactly as now a million years in the future. Its light and heat will vary through slight cycles, but we may trust in the laws which control the forces of the universe. The "scientist" when he gives rein to his imagination, and writes of burning suns, and ashes of dead worlds blown through space, may laugh at the lurid picture, but to those who place confidence in his attainments, who believe in his superior knowledge, and have not studied the subject for themselves, the thought becomes a horror and menace to peace of mind and right thinking, and to write such falsehoods, such enormous interpolations of nature is little short of crime—it IS a crime and a libel on science and a blasphemy of God.

W. H. Plummer:—Q.—The following is from the Baltimore Sun, reported as from Henry Kellar, the magician who has started out to show that all manifestations, so-called spiritual, are fakes. What reply can be made to the following quotation from his communication?

The Fox Sisters.—"I knew the Fox sisters, who started the present great fad. I know what miserable frauds they were—one a vicious old harridan and the other a timid tool. They were exposed by the New York Herald fifteen or twenty years ago.

"I have read of Sir William Crookes' experiments with Edgar Home. They are mystifying, but I believe that I can do what Home did. Crookes was mistaken. That is all.

"The easiest man to fool on earth is a scientific man. An intellectual person is always the easiest dupe, because he is not practical and everyday. You can lead him to deceive himself.

"If a bunch of professional gamblers and newspaper men were to certify that such an occurrence was to the best of their knowledge and belief supernatural I might believe in a spirit world. But I know too much to do that as things are at present."

A.—Henry Kellar was born in 1849 (see Who is Who in America) and hence the rappings beginning in 1848 were a year ahead of his birth. He "knew the Fox sisters!" one was an "old harridan, the other a timid tool." And they were 12 and 9 years of age at the time! Kellar had not informed himself sufficiently to tell a straight, consistent story. He gets trapped in the start. He evidently did not know of the "sisters" or the "rappings" occurring a year before the great event which ushered him into a world he has wasted his life in fooling.

His memory of prenatal events is most surprising, and the credulity which believes him ought not to balk at "spooks," or camel-swallowing.

He finishes Sir William Crookes in short order, and in so doing shows that he has not even read the writings of Sir William, much less followed his experimentation. Kellar says "I have read of Sir William Crookes' experiments with Edgar Home." "Read of," not read. Had he read for himself he would have found that it was D. D. Home, not "Edgar," who was the wonderful medium who astonished the courts of Europe, and that Sir William Crookes' best researches were not made through him. You will have to search a long time to find another such instance of arrogant ignorance and utter disregard of the facts and the truth.

From the beginning, the capital stock of all exposers has been ignorance of the subject. The less they know, the more dogmatic, sure and arrogant. Think of a mountebank whose whole life has been given to deception, setting up as judge, court and jury over the men of science who have devoted their lives to research after the truth!

Investigator:—Q.—What is Spiritualism in a nutshell?

A.—Spiritualism is a science, a philosophy, a religion, blended into unity.

Arthur E. Wilmot:—Q.—In attempting to ascertain the elements in and about the sun with a spectroscope do the elements in the earth's atmosphere offer any impediment?

A.—None whatever. It is the rays of light which are analyzed and give the story of their origin, and the space through which they move—if transparent, does not impress any change on them.

Spiritual Science Association.

To the Editor: There is a tendency among all of the orthodox and unorthodox people throughout America and other countries to scoff at and belittle the name of Spiritualism as uncanny and ghostly or something to keep away from as unnatural. The one claiming to be a Spiritualist is looked upon as being unbalanced in his upper story, crazy or demented, and a fit subject for a lunatic asylum, or any other name they can think of applying to one believing in Spiritualism.

Now I would like to suggest a name for our National Association that I believe all free-thought and occult societies can come under this banner, making a stronger and larger organization for the betterment of the truths that we represent. I would suggest the name of Spiritualism be changed to Spiritual Science, as our cause or belief has been proven by scientific methods in hundreds of cases in the past, and I consciously believe if the name were changed that there are a large number of people who now remain on the outskirts of Spiritualism who would join hands with us and help to create one of the largest organizations in this country believing in its doctrines.

After the name is changed let the National Association draw up a code of laws covering the National and State Associations, with a proviso that each State Association will issue a certificate to all the genuine mediums who make application and have been tested and proven to be genuine. And when these mediums change their location for engagements for any length of time, let them show their certificate to the society that they are engaged by. At the same time let each Spiritual Science Society organize an Anti-Fake and Fraud League to eliminate the fakers and frauds who are sailing under the colors of Spiritualism or Spiritual Science, as every city and town throughout the country is infested with them. The Anti-Fake League can investigate the frauds and report them to the city authorities and have them run out of town. The writer believes that something upon these lines as suggested is the only possible way to eliminate the fraudulent element from our ranks.

Requesting that the National Spiritualists' Association will give the above suggestion due consideration, and see if a change of name will not redound to the benefit of and secure a large increase of membership in the Spiritual Science Association.

I would like to see this matter discussed or hear from some of the readers of your paper on this subject.

MEDICAL SUGGESTIONS.

Diseases of the Head, Neck and Throat, and the Proper Method of Treatment.

I shall have to ask the pardon of The Progressive Thinker and its readers if I wander a little farther afield, or branch out on an unusual subject than has been customarily discussed in its columns. My apology is that the world needs the instruction here given. Here on the coast, and I suppose all over the country, appears to be a list of diseases of the head, eyes, ears, and throat, which are the most speedily and surely cured by magnetic treatments. Sometimes it appears as facial neuralgia, sometimes as severe headaches, sometimes as weakness of the eyes, roaring in the head and earache, then again it appears in the throat or tonsils, or glottis, or perhaps again as asthma, and congestion of the lungs and distress in the bronchial tubes, and occasionally nearly all of these symptoms. I am unable to give the cause of this epidemic (or is it endemic—peculiar to the Pacific coast?) perhaps some of our astrologists may be able to do so. They can not lay it to Aries, for it didn't appear till our earth had passed into the constellation of Taurus, according to their methods of computation, though as a matter of fact, we really have passed into Aquarius when they put us into Aries. Perhaps when I mention the afflicted nerves, causing these diseases, they may be able to tell us what the heavens have to do in afflicting us, as above indicated.

These diseases all arise from a congested condition of the occipital, cervical and trigeminal nerves (the nerves that enter the head from the back of the neck, nerves in the neck branching out to the throat, tongue and roof of the mouth, and nerves under the ear, at the junction of the lower jaw). This congestion is induced by de-oxigenated carbon (carbonic acid gas lodged in the capillaries, and may often be detected as small globules. When in the occiput, as is nearly always the case, when the cervical plexus is affected, it is very likely to affect the optic nerve, and thus shut off that nerve from its legitimate function. The patient will then have weak eyes, and if in addition the trigeminal nerve is affected, it will combine its action by affecting another weakness to the eye, from the outside of the brain, induce facial neuralgia, tonsilitis, sore throat, weakness, or loss of voice, and combined with an affliction of the nerves branching from the back of the neck, will also induce asthma, and sometimes congestion of the lungs or a "bad cold." In nearly all cases, as before stated, the trigeminal, and all adjacent nerves will be affected. These nerves branch in three directions, as stated above, and often affect the ear, and all other parts of the system they function. The cervical plexus also affects the throat, the trachea, and as it extends to the cardiac plexus, may weaken the action of the heart, and sometimes the trouble may recede from this plexus and enter the shoulders as rheumatism, or the intercostal muscles as neuralgia, or angina pectoris.

It is all the same disease under different names, and your doctor will treat according to what name he gives it. The "eye specialist" will put some kind of a "spell" on it by washing it with some coarse liquid or possibly he may want to take your eyes out and scrape them. Then you will have a "scrape" on your hands, or rather in your eyes. And your family physician will have some medicine for the ear, and a gargle for the throat, though neither one of them has been known to cure, or even relieve the pain, and if asthma becomes unbearable, a hypodermic, or some other outlandish application may be administered. But all treatments will be administered to the periphery of the nerves, or where the pain manifests instead of where it should be.

Many of our magnetic healers labor under the same delusion, and for the reason that all have not studied my book, "Manual of Magnetic Healing," which, by the way mentions this subject rather too briefly, I wish to give the following instructions. If the reader of this does not live convenient to a magnetic healer, then he should apply to some person near by. In all cases, the doctor should commence by massage—thrust the fingers as far up and under the occiput (the base of the skull), and dig, as if he expected to get some offensive matter, always pulling down towards the shoulders and throat. By this method, the gaseous globules will be disturbed and moved away and magnetism will be imparted to the weakened nerve. The doctor, or whoever manipulates the patient should take plenty of time in this treatment. If he or she is not psychometric to the disease they should use nearly an hour in the treatment.

Next the fingers should reach up under the ears in the same manner as above indicated, drawing over the submaxillary gland to the throat. And this treatment should be repeated all along under the jaw, and down the throat, for the tendency is when this gas is driven from one place to move along toward the termination of the nerves. The whole back of the neck should then be treated from the back down toward the throat. After which a general treatment should be given to the shoulders and arms as there is sometimes a tendency of the disease to pass to these extremities in the shape of rheumatism; and also the top part of the spine, as indicated in "Manual of Magnetic Healing," for it will often be found that a chilly sensation appears between the shoulders in cases of this kind. If the patient comes to you with a violent nervous or billious headache, instant relief may be given by taking the patient at the junction of the jaws, one hand on each side, and a part of the fingers in front and a part behind the ears, and pulling up from the body with great force, for thirty seconds, more or less.

If this article is germane or legitimate to the policy of The Progressive Thinker, I shall feel repaid for the time employed in writing it. The word "Doctor" means a teacher, not an obscurer, as regular M.D.'s are required to be, and I want to make good my right to the title.

THE "REGULATION" WORK.

It is Gradually Spreading.—Tried in Nearly All the Large Cities, and Spiritualism and Honest Mediums Will for a Time Suffer, All This Arising from Fake Work in Connection With Spirit Return.

The Ft. Wayne (Ind.) Journal-Gazette of May 23 gives the following:

Councilman Wyss, Langard and Loesch, of the council committee on rules, regulations and ordinances, and Councilman Welch, the father of the ordinance which seeks to impose a license of $500 on all palmists, clairvoyants and fortune-tellers who operate in the city, heard more about clairvoyancy last night than they ever knew before, when a delegation from the Independent Spiritualist Association appeared to know if the ordinance would interfere with the religious practices of the organization.

The committee had met to consider the Welch bill, but after hearing the Spiritualists the matter was taken under advisement until Monday night. The delegation of Spiritualists was composed of Mrs. M. M. Hoyles, secretary of the local association; Mr. W. G. Miller, a medium; Mr. H. H. Haines and Mr. E. G. Pierce.

All the members of the delegation said they appeared to learn if the ordinance would interfere with their religious meetings. They explained that clairvoyancy is a part of their religious worship, but that it is not practiced for money and that no promises are made or riches discovered. All said they are opposed to the class of fakes known as fortune-tellers and would support any ordinance to drive them out of business, so long as the ordinance does not interfere with their practices. They explained that the association is incorporated under the laws of Indiana.

"I practice my psychic gift," said Mr. Miller, but not for money. I give my services gratis. We are not in sympathy with fakers. The psychic gift is a natural gift and cannot be acquired. I have often given messages from departed friends and have made sorrowing ones happy. That is why I practice it."

Mrs. Hoyles said her organization always has clairvoyants in its hall and the only thing feared from the ordinance is that someone might make trouble through spitework without understanding the work of the association.

We have felt the rascally work of fakers more than you have," she said, "and we want them driven out."

"I have always been opposed to licensing wrong," said Mr. Haines. "We should make fortune-telling prohibitory and provide jail sentences for violations. I would prohibit all save Spiritualistic mediums or ordained ministers of our organization. We know we can communicate with the departed, but only through a medium or clairvoyant. Why, Mr. Miller has communicated with my brother-in-law. Brother Miller described him and communicated with him, though he never saw him in life. This is what we don't want you to interfere with. We don't believe it; we know it. It is our religion. The constitution gives us the right to worship as we please, and you couldn't prevent us though you might cause us trouble."

"I do not see how this ordinance can hurt us any," said Mr. Pierce, unless persons try to make it appear that we practise fortune-telling, which we do not do. Clairvoyancy is a science just as much as electricity, though it takes deeper study. I have lived here forty to forty-five years and have held hundreds of seances, but I have never charged a cent for admission except for charity. Spiritual philosophy is only what can be proved. I am for the ordinance if it does not interfere with us.

Members of the council committee informed the delegation that if the city ordinance conflicted in any way with rights given the association by state enactment the ordinance would be void in that respect. The committee desired further time to consider the new phase introduced by the Spiritualists and took a recess until Monday night. No opposition whatever to the Welch ordinance has developed in the council.

The Ft. Wayne Sentinel says:

"Clairvoyants, palmists, fortune-tellers and others of the ilk who have systematically robbed people in Fort Wayne for years, had their graft taken from them last night when the city council passed an ordinance requiring a license fee of $1,000 a year, all to be paid when the license is obtained. This is regarded as prohibitive. Councilman Welch introduced the ordinance at the last session, fixing the license at $500, but the committee on rules, regulations and ordinances went him one better and doubled the price, which met his approval. There was not a vote against the measure.

GETS HIS SPOUSE AND COIN.

Influenced by Medium, Woman Takes Husband's Savings and Flees With Her Parents.—She Leaves a Note in Looted Home, Saying "I Love You Still."

Influenced by a Spiritualist medium who told her a curse had been placed on her life by the spirit of a dead sister, Mrs. Arthur Crook, wife of a mechanic employed at the Pullman shops, fled from her home at 4735 Sherman avenue, Globesville, taking with her $1,400, her husband's savings of several years.

With her went her mother and father, Mr. and Mrs. Theodore Mifert, of 4739 Sherman avenue, and the party, under the guidance of the Spiritualist, is thought to be traveling in a wagon toward the southern part of the state.

Crook called at police headquarters last night and told his story to Captain of Detectives Loomis. He asked that some effort be made to apprehend the fugitives. There is no law under which the woman could be arrested, since, as Crook claimed, she is his legal wife and entitled to a share of his money and property.

The name of the man who induced his wife and her parents to leave was unknown to Crook, but a woman he claimed to be his wife's medium moved into the house next door, 4737 Sherman avenue, a few weeks ago. The couple are said to have come from Brooklyn. After cultivating the acquaintance of Mrs. Crook, learning her family history and incidentally gaining knowledge of the fact that Crook possessed nearly $2,000 in cash, they began to work on the woman's weakness.—The Rocky Mountain News, Denver, Col., May 27, 1908.

SPIRITS APPEAR.

Startling Spontaneous Phenomena in England.

The following account of three very extraordinary experiences which have occurred, so I am informed and have every reason to believe, in my house within the last eighteen months, will, I think, be of interest to the readers of Light.

I may say, by way of introduction, that loud, triple knocks, amounting at times to forcible blows, have been heard upon the bedroom doors—generally proceeding, not from passages, but from unoccupied adjacent bedrooms—at various times during the last three years. These have been reported to me by my mother, the servants, my wife, and a gentleman friend, who happened to be staying with me when the servants were away, and who was the sole occupant of that range of rooms in which he slept. I have never heard these knockings, but the testimony for them is too strong to be doubted. In July, 1907, the phenomena, or whatever they may be termed, assumed a new and startling guise. One night in the above month, in the small hours after midnight, I was awakened by my wife crying out in a loud voice, "Who are you?" In a few seconds I sprang out of bed, and the next moment heard my wife say: "Strike a match (the night-light had gone out) and look under the bed; there's a man in the room." Instantly I did so and looked round in some alarm, at the same time backing towards the place where I kept a loaded revolver for such emergencies. I then lit the lamp and looked under the bed. There was no one save ourselves in the room, and the door was locked. She informed me that she was awakened by someone lifting up the bedclothes and turning them back from her hands, then a hand grasped hers and felt the fingers as if feeling for her rings. She tried to cry out but could not for a time, but at last got out the cry, "Who are you?" which I had heard distinctly, and at the same moment she grasped the hand just as it was leaving hers, snatching at it, but it seemed to melt away in her grasp, though seeming real and solid for an appreciable time. This incident much upset us at the time, but I put it down to nightmare and we gradually forgot it.

From August to November, 1907, my wife repeatedly complained of the appearance of the figure of a man in the bedroom. This figure she often first saw in the wardrobe mirror, and then, on looking up, perceived it standing in the room, and it almost invariably walked round the bed. She describes it as having a calm, good face, not threatening in any way. One very interesting part of her description refers to the figure distinctly casting a shadow when passing the night-light. On all these occasions, save two, I was asleep, but on one occasion, was in the next room, and on another my wife saw the figure pass her on the stairs and precede her to the kitchen, the door of which was found locked. During this period we had no maids. I put these things down to hallucination or some disordered state of my wife's health, or possibly something akin to crystal-gazing; I therefore covered the mirror with a curtain.

On Dec. 19, 1907, I awoke about 7:30 and heard my wife in a very restless condition. I roused myself and asked what was the matter. She informed me that she had been awake quite two hours, and that "that thing had been again."

The light was out and the room, which has curtains and blind to the windows, was yet dark. I rose and lit the lamp. She now informed me that she had been awakened two hours, or more, previously by a feeling of intense cold and the blowing of a strong cold breeze upon her cheek. She turned her head in the direction of the wind, and saw just at the foot of the bed and close to the right hand side (the side upon which I lie) a tall pillar of white cloudy light reaching right up to the ceiling. As she turned fully towards it the cold wind seemed to come from it and blow straight in her face. This pillar of light illuminated the bed coverlet, and she could also see the dressing-table and its mirror. The light was bright like a column of muslin wrapped in spiral swaths with a bright light inside. She looked at it for quite two minutes, feeling the cold wind blowing all the time. She then buried her head under the clothes for a considerable time, and on again looking up the pillar of light was gone and the room in darkness. During the whole of this appearance I was asleep.

So recently as April 7 last I was awakened, at 5 a. m., by my wife shaking me vigorously. I at once cried out, "What is the matter?" She replied, "Hush! that thing is here again." I at once sat up in bed, all alert, and looked most intently in every direction. The night-light had gone out and the room was intensely dark, not the faintest glimmer of light being seen, the blinds being down and the heavy curtains drawn. After satisfying myself on this point from the position where I sat, I arose and walked about the room, peering in every direction, in order to satisfy myself that no glimmer of light penetrated from outside. I then lit a candle, and my wife informed me that she had been awake for some time previous to arousing me, and that a few minutes before she had done so she perceived a bright light at the foot of the bed, just at my feet, but seemingly projected upon or enclosing one of the smaller brass knobs on the rail at the bed's foot. At first the size of a man's hand, it began to increase in height and breadth until in about a minute it had attained the thickness of a man's body, and stood up a full yard above the rail. She describes it as being very bright, and like gauze with a light inside. She tried to call me but could not speak. I was asleep and breathing heavily, and this light pillar was standing just at my feet, and, as far as she could see, partly upon the bed. At last, in terror lest the phenomenon might develop into something very terrifying, she shook me vigorously. The light still shone and increased, but the instant I awoke and cried out, "What is the matter?" she avers that the light collapsed and sank down in curious folds exactly like the shutting-up of a camera bellows and disappeared.

Much astonished at this second recital, I at once put out the light and together we watched for further manifestation, but nothing occurred, and in half an hour's time, or thereabouts, signs of dawn began to steal through the curtains. I may say that we are both young and in the prime of life, and these manifestations—presuming that my wife, the servants, my mother, and gentleman friend are not the victims of some extraordinary hallucination—are entirely unsought and spontaneous. As to what is their meaning or origin, or whereunto they will grow, I am unable to say.—A Clergyman of the Church of England, in Light, London.

INDICATING PROGRESS.

The Times of Brockton, Mass., Has Opened Its Columns to the Discussion of Subjects Pertaining to Spiritualism, Thus Indicating the Trend of the Twentieth Century. The Following is From That Paper.

To the Editor of the Times: A reader of your esteemed paper sent me a clipping whereby spirits are discussed by a company of intelligent young men, members of one of your city churches. It reads: It is not for the churches of to-day to prove that there is no such thing as spiritual communication, but that it devolves upon the Spiritualists to prove the identity of the spirit with which they claim to communicate. The church has much to do with modern Spiritualism, for out of it all the best psychics came and the spirits that communicate are the church people's dead, their father, mother and friends.

Spiritualism has no special ruling or governing spirit to demonstrate to the world; neither is it necessary to go to a Spiritual medium or seance in order to receive a communication. You can get it in your own home; it is universal, belongs to all the human family. I was converted first into the church, second into the belief of spirit return, and in the home of a good orthodox minister our first circle was held. For four years we received such demonstrations that we were forced to believe, for people who had departed this life thirty years previous appeared and controlled our tongues to articulate their message. This class was composed of five good church members; two out of the five are living as witnesses of those marvelous meetings in 1875.

Spirit return is no humbug, but rather the opening wide of the gate which leads into the city of our absent dead. Spiritualism has broken the bars of the tomb, put forever at rest the thought of a burning hell and made it possible for other isms and religions to gain expression on this earth. If spirits were material bodies then spiritualism might convince one of the reality of their communications, but spirit can be sensed only by those who are educated up to its laws. Then again they say that a law of free love with no necessity for marriage and divorce are unchristian and detrimental to the human race. I deny that Spiritualists as a people are free lovers. In the first place what is free love? Some years ago a community of that peculiar people lived in the town of Wallingford, Conn., some fifteen miles from New Haven, but in no way whatever were they associated or believed in spirit return. No, they based their religion on the Bible. That book was read daily in their halls of pleasure and of justice. Free love means community love, governed by a community father, chosen by the people, endowed with all the rights of a dictator. This people believed in universal love, not in the one love. There was no marriage, no divorce. They were just honest in their way of living as the most zealous church member. But Spiritualism as a religion and a people have no sympathy with free loveism, neither is it responsible for the individual lives of those who profess its truths any more than the church is of her fallen members.

Spiritualists believe in marriage and divorce, they live like other people, other religions, telepathy, suggestion is the sensing of human surrounding reading mentally the human mind, mediumship the sensing of an invisible presence not tangible to the senses. The spirit communicating acts on the human brain through the currents of magnetic fluid, extracted either from the medium or some one else who is in rapport with them, the message is reflected onto the perceptions of the individual. Their language employ to convey it to another similar to the telephone. If the medium is spiritually educated up to spiritual law then the sitter gets a correct communication direct from the unseen world.

Clairvoyance, or second sight, a double of the one person. It is independent of spirit power and can be made to travel to any distance, describe the living as well as the dead. The clairvoyant sees the spirit, hears their voice and can describe and locate diseases of the human body Like the X-ray, when clairvoyant sight is combined with the mediumistic spirit essence, then we have the adept one who can control equally alike the living and the dead.

MOTHER.

(Dedicated to Mrs. Hulda Loebel.)

Your mother is not gone,
The curtain's but withdrawn,—
A sweeter, fuller song
Now bursts upon her dawn;
While you, half dreaming, sleep
And 'mid the shadows weep.

Your mortal hanging hide,
Like curtains thin between,
The beauty, real and wide
That now by her is seen;
While in your narrow hall
You mourn, and think this all.

Your mother really lives,
A soul in her own place,
But wait, for Nature gives
To each, the needed grace;
And face to face some day
You'll wake and greet the day.

Just listen in the night,
And peer the darkness through,
There clad in living light
Your mother, watching you;—
Then trust and toil, nor fear,
Your living mother's near.

Philadelphia Society of Spiritualists.

The closing month of the present course of lectures was conducted by Prof. R. A. Macurda, of Boston, Mass.

Prof. Macurda is a very able lecturer and has fine controlling influences.

For the five Sundays of May Prof. Macurda has held two services each Sunday. His controlling influences presented able and convincing arguments for the philosophy of Spiritualism as a religion of Truth, forcibly demonstrating spirit return and the continuity of life.

Thursday evening, May 21, at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. Elwanger, a circle was held for the benefit of the Building Fund.

Thursday evening, May 28, an entertainment was held under the auspices of the children's Lyceum, from which was realized $35. An excellent program was presented, followed by remarks by the president of the society, Mr. Thos. Locke, and Prof. Macurda.

At the close of the entertainment a social and dance was enjoyed by all present, and at a late hour each felt to say good night and express themselves as having had a very enjoyable evening.

Sunday evening, May 31, was observed as memorial Sunday, and through the request of Prof. Macurda, veterans of the civil war, their wives and families were invited to attend, and many availed themselves of the privilege of hearing this eloquent speaker. His oration was a grand eulogy of the civil war, which was highly pleasing and well accepted.

Each Sunday brought out new faces to hear Prof. Macurda in his beautiful work.

Prof. Macurda will be at Parkland Heights camp meeting the last three Sundays in August, and it is hoped by his many friends both in and out of the society that he will have a return engagement in the coming fall.

CAMP CHESTERFIELD.

I wish to say a few words about this beautiful spot, about our home, and the few who are here on the ground enjoying the beautiful scenery, and air, and water.

We have been here a week, housecleaning and getting our little Helping Hand cottage in readiness for visitors, where all will be made welcome who wish to enjoy the hospitalities of our home. We have four rooms and can accommodate five persons. It is situated on the highest spot on the camp grounds, quite near, to a lovely spring of running water, cool and refreshing.

This is an ideal evening, the golden sun is slowly sinking behind the golden clouds and sending a stream of beautiful sunlight all over the ground. Birds are chirping, squirrels are jumping from tree to tree, the katydids are singing their mournful song.

Mr. O'Neill, our president, has spared no pains with his efficient board of earnest workers to make this the most beautiful camp in the country. All stumps have been removed and a gravel walk from the entrance to the auditorium is one grand improvement, while a diamond shaped flower bed at the entrance is inviting to visitors. The grounds are all mowed and look like a green velvet lawn. The trees are at their best. No pains have been spared, and all seem to enjoy the many improvements, and we all hope it may be our lot to sow the good seed of spiritual truth in the hearts of many who are now in the darkened path of orthodoxy. May many souls receive spiritual food in our little home, as well as in our camp meetings.

Mr. O'Neill, our camp president, has one of the most beautiful cottages on the grounds. He had done much to beautify the grounds, his motive to make this a true home, where all can come and enjoy a few weeks of recreation and receive words of comfort from those loved ones gone to the higher life. He has all rubbish cleaned up and the grounds are today a credit to his artistic eye.

Mrs. Pearce also has a lovely little home-like cottage, and is a medium of long standing. Mrs. McKee also has a cozy home-like place, and is also a medium. Mrs. Michels, also a noble woman, has a lovely home-like place, and her garden is a bower of beauty—roses and vines everywhere. Mr. Jessup, a trumpet medium, is also on the ground, and his home is also one of beauty. He has been doing work all over the state with satisfactory results. Then Mrs. Hedrick and daughters are here from Brooklyn, New York. They have a beautiful home, and the air is filled with their youthful laughter. Mrs. Moore has a lovely little cottage and is a bower of beauty. Mr. Barnhart is here with his family, next to the Helping Hand, and has a large cottage. He is a good physical medium but does not work at it at all. Mr. Cunningham has a cozy litle cottage next the auditorium, and is a handy man around the camp. Mrs. Millspaugh has a cottage on the ground and is the efficient secretary. Mrs. Channess and granddaughter are the last comers, and were welcomed by all.

The camp is to have many attractions during its session. Some of the speakers are O. A. Edgerly, B. F. Austin, T. Grimshaw, G. S. Letford, Mrs. Carrie E. S. Twing, Mrs. D. A. Morrell and Mrs. Crossfield. Let all work together to build up that which is noble and good and elevating in our beautiful religion.

I do not question the sincerity of the recent investigation at Lily Dale and hope it may prove beneficial to all camps to eliminate all things and mediums that savor of spurious work. Let only those who can and do practice nothing but honest work, whether it be mental or physical mediumship be admitted.

There is also here a large lodging house, where home-like rooms can be secured at reasonable rates, and large dining hall, managed by a good chef.

Any one desirous of spending a few weeks pleasantly and profitably will not fail to be benefited by coming here.

Any one wishing to donate anything to the Helping Hand cottage for the benefit of the sick and needy can send to the the secretary,

MRS. MARTHA WOOLSEY.
Camp Chesterfield, Indiana.

"The Searchers."—A most entertaining book by Stephen K. Szymanowski. This interesting story of a series of pathetic experiences which take place in the city of Los Angeles, extols the noble sentiment of family duties and love for family ties. While the simple narrative may attract the attention of the general reader, the the timely reflections upon the deeper problems of life are bound to interest a thinker. Many up-to-date subjects such as occultism, metaphysics, re-incarnation are discussed in a most instructive manner, while a beautiful, pure love story runs through the whole book. Review of Rev. R. V. Hunter's Attack Upon Spiritualism.

A distinctly valuable service to Spiritualists has been rendered by Prof. W. M. Lockwood by publishing in neat pamphlet form his able and masterly reply to the attack of Rev. R. V. Hunter upon Spiritualism. Fairly and squarely he meets and demolishes the doughty Reverend's boldly asserted statements. We opine that the Rev. Hunter and others of his kind will hesitate before they attempt again to demolish Spiritualism, after reading Prof. Lockwood's review.

Additional value is given to this brochure by a striking list of names of Professors, Scientists, Actors, Lawyers and statesmen who accept the facts of modern Spiritualism.

For fifteen cents this valuable pamphlet can be procured of Prof. W. M. Lockwood, 723 Prospect avenue, Buffalo, N. Y.

JERUSALEM AS IT IS.

Turks Prevent Christian Monks From Murdering.—Sultan Has to Keep Troops in the Church of the Nativity in Bethlehem.—Joseph M. Grady Tells Why Jerusalem is not Inspiring To-day.

Six hundred and fifty passengers in the steamship "Arabic" are now touring the "Holy Land," sixty-five of the number being clergymen. About forty years ago Mark Twain visit Jerusalem, and was shown where the cross stood, the court room of Pilate, the tomb where Jesus was laid, etc., etc. He at that time informed his readers that all these so-called sacred places and sacred relics were shameless frauds, and the clergy all over America denounced him as a heretic. Numerous other writers have exposed those priestly swindles, but still the pious pilgrims every year go to the "Holy Land" to weep and pray at the Holy Sepulchre, and to view fragments of the true cross, to see the actual manger in which Jesus was born, to handle the nails which were driven through the hands of the Savior, etc., etc. James M. Grady is the latest writer to show the religious dupes of this country how wickedly they are being deceived by cunning priests. He says:

"We saw Jerusalem to our hearts' content, and I venture to say that out of the 650 passengers of the Arabic who saw it there is not one who would want to see it again. I have spoken with many good Christian men and women of our party—from many states—and the consensus of opinion is that one's faith is—to put it mildly—not strengthed by a visit to the Holy City.

"In this connection it might be well to state that the history of Jerusalem is—unlike that of Rome—not continuous. For fifty years after its destruction by Titus the site of Jerusalem was a wilderness, and for many years thereafter it was a village of huts. Then the Emperor Hadrian rebuilt the city—or rather built a city on the site of the old, and it was a pagan city until Helena, the mother of Constantine, visited Jerusalem some 300 years after the ascension of Christ, and "discovered" the holy places pointed out to the pilgrims of to-day by ignorant monks and more ignorant guides. The only thing we can accept with any degree of certainty is that Palestine in and around Jerusalem was the scene of the life and crucifixion of our Lord.

Soldiers Prevent Murder.

"I wish to make it plain here that I write this letter in no irreverent spirit, but when I saw armed Turkish soldiers doing sentry duty in the Church of the Holy Sepulchre in Jerusalem and in the Church of the Nativity in Bethlehem for the sole purpose of preventing Christian monks from murdering each other—as they have done in the past—for the love of God, I confess that I felt outraged that the religion professed by many of the most enlightened peoples of the earth should be so degraded in the eyes of Moslms by fanatical monks. These monks are Latin, Coptic, Russian and Armenian Christians, among whom the aforesaid churches are divided by the Turkish government, each sect having its own section of each church.

"Outside of the 'American colony' and the Garden of Gethsemane, Jerusalem is the filthiest place on the planet.

"I shall not attempt to describe those places, because I do not believe they are the places made sacred by the presence of Christ, many of them being grouped together as if for convenience. Suffice it to say that we were shown along the "via Dolorosa," and among other places of interest pointed out to us was the exact spot from which the Cyrenean was made to bear the cross of the fainting Christ. We also visited the Mount of Olives, the tomb of David, the mosque of Omar, built on the supposed site of Solomon's temple, the tombs of the kings, the quarries of Solomon and other places of interest, such as the wailing place of the Jews, the pool of Siloam, etc., etc., being followed everywhere we went by crowds of filthy beggars crying "Baksheesh."

"On the whole, a visit to Jerusalem is not conducive to one's enjoyment of a trip. Its mongrel population is the most degraded and filthiest (beasts are clean compared with them) it is possible to imagine. There is not one redeeming trait visible either in the city or its people, and we left Jerusalem joyfully happy to get away from it, yet glad that we had seen it, for it was an experience never to be forgotten, and not likely to be repeated."

Hundreds of thousands of dollars are annually expended by "Christians" in visiting Jerusalem, Bethlehem and other towns mentioned in the Holy Scriptures, and a vast army of lazy, crafty, swindling monks are supported by these fanatical dupes who are shown by the "guides" every house, hill, creek, pool, garden, spring and tree mentioned in the New Testament. They even showed the visitor the very stone on which the rooster stood when he thrice crowed when Peter denied his Lord.

The different Christian sects in Jerusalem are very hostile each to the other; each denounces the other as dishonest, wicked swindlers. Often they fight viciously.

Jerusalem is under Mohammedan rule, and it is well that such is the fact. If the Moslems did not compel these Christians to obey the law there would be frequent bloody riots and killings.

One set of Christians show the visitor a part of the crown of thorns, the thigh-bone of the Apostle John, fragments of the cross, the spear that penetrated the side of Jesus, etc., etc. Their rivals assert that these things are bogus and that they have the genuine articles.

The Mohammedan soldier walks up and down his beat and keeps an eye open to see that one dear Christian does not bounce a brick off the pious head of his Christian brother.

SHE WAS IN A TRANCE.

Remarkable Evidence of Spirit Influence.—A Distracted Mother in a Trance Finds Her Lost Child.—Trails Child Into the Wild Hills, Where Coyotes and Wolves Yelp at the Child as She Sleeps.

Thermopolis, Wyo., June 6.—When the 4-year-old daughter of Mrs. J. Powers, wandered away from a sheep camp, forty miles northwest of this place, half a dozen parties of searchers scoured the country for forty-eight hours fruitlessly and expert trailers failed to trace the tiny footprints.

Then that wonderful something designated as "instinct" developed in the frantic mother and she set out from camp and walked six miles straight into the hills to where her baby lay asleep under a sage clump, watched by a pack of hungry coyotes, too cowardly to take advantage of her helplessness.

Anxious friends followed the mother, believing her insane from grief, and when, half a mile from the end of her remarkable journey, she screamed and broke into a run, they were sure their diagnosis was correct. Their astonishment was great when the sobbing, exhausted woman threw herself down in the sagebrush and clasped the baby in her arms.

With the characteristic delicacy of the so-called "rough" people of the range, they turned away from contemplation of a scene rightfully belonging only to the mother and the child.

Mrs. Powers is employed as a cook at one of John Brown's sheep camps in the Cottonwood country, and the little girl lives with her at the camp. A few mornings ago one of the herders, after he had proceeded some distance from the camp, discovered that the little Powers girl was following him.

With a hard day before him he did not care to be bothered with the child, so turned her back toward camp and gave her instructions to proceed home.

Meanwhile the baby had been missed at the camp, but Mrs. Powers was not uneasy when informed that she had been seen accompanying a herder to his day's work, it being a custom of the men to take the little favorite with them while they followed the sheep.

At night when the herder returned and was questioned regarding the baby, consternation was caused in camp by his announcement that he had sent her home early in the morning. Immediately every available man was sent out to search the nearby country. When hours passed without the discovery of a trace of the child couriers were sent to other camps, and when morning dawned half a dozen parties were waiting to take up the search.

At dawn they found little footprints pointing toward the mountains, and expert trailers laboriously followed the trail for more than a mile, where it was lost on the bank of a stream. On the opposite side of the creek the baby's shoes and stockings were found, where she had abandoned them after wading the shallow water.

Hounds Take Up Trail.

Before afternoon a thorough search of the country for ten miles in every direction had been made without results. Then V. D. Putney and his pack of fox hounds were summoned from a distant ranch, arriving at dusk. The hounds had difficulty in following the trail, then thirty-six hours cold, and lost it beyond the creek.

Late that night the search was abandoned and the searchers returned to camp to tell the distracted mother that her baby was probably dead, drowned in the creek or devoured by wolves. Mrs. Powers collapsed at these tidings, but later became strangely calm and sat LIKE ONE IN A TRANCE UNTIL MORNING DAWNED.

Then, calling the others to her, she instructed them to follow, and set off at a hard walk for the mountains, five miles distant. Never deviating from a bee line, and seemingly indifferent to the country and those following her, the woman pursued her course up the foothills and to the edge of a sage flat, where she broke into a run. Ten minutes later she fell exhausted beside the sleeping missing one.

Strangely enough the little girl had not suffered greatly during her forty-eight hours in the open, and told a lucid story of her wanderings. When turned back by the herder she had followed a road which she supposed led to camp, but which finally took her to an abandoned sawmill in the foothills.

En route she encountered the creek, and took off her shoes and stockings to wade it. On the other side her infant fingers were unable to accomplish the task of replacing the stockings, and she left them and her shoes beside the stream, afterward wandering miles in her bare feet through rocky and cacti sprinkled country, but sustaining never a bruise or wound from a thorn.

At dark she laid down under a bush and sobbed herself to sleep, after drawing her bare feet within her dress and placing stones on the hem of the garment to hold it down and keep out the wind. She awakened after daylight and ate grass to satisfy the cravings of hunger. All day long she wandered on, crying when she could, but generally beyond tears.

Once she approached a sheep corral where men were working, but in her childish imagination the place appeared a jail and she fled in fright. Later she saw a man on horseback and called to him, but he rode on unheeding. This man acknowledges that he thought he heard a child crying in the sagebrush and looked about but could see no one, and supposed the cry of some bird had deceived him.

Animals Did Not Attack.

That evening, says the little, she went into the hills, where coyotes began to follow her. "There were little ones and two big ones," she said. The big ones probably were wolves, and why they did not attack the little creature the men of the camp are unable to explain, as wolves are far more courageous than coyotes and have been known to attack men in the same region.

At night the lost baby laid down under a cottonwood tree and went to sleep. "I wasn't afraid," she said in her story, "cause I heard mamma calling all night long and knew she would find me soon." Once, says the child, she was awakened by a gruff voice shouting, "Whose you?" She sprang up and cried, "I'm mamma's little girl," but the voice did not answer again.

At daylight she awakened and again heard her mother calling, and satisfied, sank again to sleep. At that hour her mother, in camp six miles away, had just begun her journey to her lost loved one's side, and some psychic power had carried to the baby the assurance that mamma would soon be present to care for her.—The News-Times, Denver, Col.

AUTO-SUGGESTION FOR NERVES.

Another patient came to us some time ago complaining not of sleeplessness, but of sleep made miserable by frightful dreams, especially by one bad recurrent dream. Here also the patient practised auto-suggestion. She was instructed to write out her dream so as to render it part of her conscious waking experience. Soon she was able to report that though the vision recurred, it was in a less tragic form. Later it gradually ceased to appear, and finally vanished away.

A third patient was a victim of indecision and extreme emotionalism. With or without provocation she gave way to tears, and a sort of moral indifference to the ordinary interests of life had settled down upon her. After explanations as to the power of attention to create and intensify nervous states, as to how the conscious will can do much to control the subconscious mind, and as to the efficacy and method of good, healthy self-suggestions, this woman was set well on the road to recovery. Here are some of her own words: "I am better, a great deal better mentally and physically, and I am beginning to learn what a wonderful power there is in suggestion. The more I use it the more remarkable it seems. When I feel discouraged, despondent, or suspicious of people, and suggest to myself the opposite of these conditions, I find that after a time the outlook changes." Similar testimony has been borne by scores of sufferers.—Rev. Samuel McComb, in Harper's Bazar.

Death Seen at a Distance.

Extract from a Letter to the Great Scientist, G. Flammarion.

(Translation from Annales des Sciences Psychiques, Dr. X. Darlex and Prof. Ch. Richet, Managers; C. D. Vesme, Editor-in-Chief. —Translated Especially for The Progressive Thinker by Mrs. A. Monthon Tattersfield.)

* * * * As an impartial author you especially seek facts.

The study of "apparitions" is unfortunately not susceptible—like astronomy in other respects—unless from mere observation, and escapes the severity of the experimental method.

There is a fact given to me by chance that perhaps might interest you:

Let me first tell you that I am 39 years old, and have no pre-established conviction on any philosophic system; but I am convinced we do not know all, and that it would be anti-scientific to deny the inexplicable. As a medical man I treated here at Vierzon, Mme X., about seventy years old, very intelligent, but of a very nervous temperament; at this particular time I treated her for attacks of asthma.

On my advice, her daughter living in Paris came to take up her residence with her in December, 1907.

In the night, between Wednesday and Thursday, Jan. 8 and 9, towards 2 o'clock in the morning the patient called her daughter, asking her to bring a light, saying: "Light the lamp. I have had a terrible nightmare." That was all she said. The following Sunday she said to her daughter, who, after having breakfasted on the ground-floor, came up in the patient's bed-room: "You must not have been able to eat much," and in answer to her daughter's astonishment, "You could not eat much in this your great sorrow; it is no use to hide it from me. Your son is dead. The other night when I called you, I saw him passing backwards and forwards behind the window-panes, looking at me. Then he vanished, but afterwards I saw him stretched out dead on a kind of slab, covered with a grey cloth."

Now the patient's grandson had actually died Wednesday, Jan. 8, in the afternoon, in a hospital where he had been admitted some time ago, and treated for pulmonary tuberculosis.

Such is the tale given to me under the first impressions; then several times at shorter or longer intervals, and this by the patient herself without any variations, in spite of my discreet but exact questions.

Allow me a few more words to show the extraordinary in the case.

The patient's daughter was informed of the death of her son only on Thursday morning, by telegraph. She did not go to Paris for the funeral, and did not leave her mother, so that no suspicion could be roused by her absence. She already wore black, and did not change her dress for mourning.

Finally, nobody spoke to the patient about her grandson, whose condition seems to have been stationary for some time. The announcement of his death came nearly as a surprise.

Such is the fact, that I simply state to you, as if I should make a clinical observation, without allowing anything for imagination.

Without wishing to explain it I shall add these few reflections:

1. Concordance of the apparition with reality.

2. The expression used by the clairvoyant is perfectly correct. When a death takes place in a hospital the body is taken to a ward kept especially for postmortem examinations, and laid upon a long, narrow table, generally covered with zinc, a kind of slab. The word is correct; Mme. X. did not know this particularity.

3. It cannot be attributed to telepathy between two brains, the apparition taking place after the young man's actual death.

4. It seems that we are facing two distinct phenomena.

(a) The image of a dead man in Paris appears to his grandmother at Vierzon. (De tail to be noted). The apparition does not enter the room, but remains outside the windows.

(b) The perception of a second living person seems to go afterwards from Virzon to see the corpse.

TO HIS MEMORY.

You've gone, dear one, from out our midst,
And we shall miss you so;
For though your eyes were dimmed with age,
'Twere sad to have you go.

We miss you in the morning, dear,
Because your cheery word
Would help to lighten every task
That through the day occurred.

We miss you at the noonday meal,—
You always had a smile,
And spoke in accents brave and true
Which made the hour worth while.

And then at night when twilight comes,
And through the pasture lane
The cowbells tinkle drowsily,
We think of you again.

But in the evening most of all
We miss your genial face,
Sitting beside the kitchen fire
In your familiar place.

And as we say our fond good-nights,
To take our needed rest;
We almost hear you whisper low:
"What is, is always best."

Pointed Practical Suggestions.

To the Editor: I see many ideas expressed in The Progressive Thinker as to how to do more for Spiritualism. Could I suggest a plan?

1. I would say subscribe for The Progressive Thinker so as to get the best literature and keep in touch with the Movement, and the people that are doing things.

2. Do not find fault with others because they do not do as you do.

3. Have toleration for all, as the best have their faults, or else we would be angels.

4. Grant to each their personality, wishing with all our hearts that they will do better and better until they attain the best.

5. The writer has seen people of ordinary intelligence that were nagged until they actually believed they were as useless as a knot on a log.

And last, let us unite in a tie of harmony in the only religion of knowledge in the world that will abolish strife and establish universal peace and truth.

BURN HERETICS AND BLASPHEMERS.

Spirit of Persecution as an Inheritance.

To the Editor: For the enclosed $1.30 please extend my subscription to The Progressive Thinker one year, and for a premium the book "Interwoven," and also two numbers of The Progressive Thinker of May 30, 1908. I can cut off one meal per day of my daily rations, with much more complacency than I can go without The Progressive Thinker.

Your scathing rebuke of your Marblehead friend in May 30 Progressive Thinker was, to say the least, a "corker." For a man in this the twentieth century to stand up and make excuses, and try to defend those guilty of the crimes recorded in that "sacred book," from petty lying all through the category, up to massacres, and many times ordered, instigated, and abetted by their GREAT, LOVING, sympathetic "Father," more cruel and bloodthirsty than any Comanche Indian that ever crossed our Western plains. With all of this taught in the Bible and churches of the present day, it is a singular fact that there are occasionally Christians that are upright and fairly honest.

But it is not from the teachings of Christianity—it is in spite of the teachings—the innate goodness of their hearts.

Look at all the leading Bible characters, the most of them (in our day) would be hanging from a gibbet, or confined in a lunatic asylum. Moses a confessed murderer, and many of them condemned by their own mouths. Then coming down nearly to our own time—at Plymouth Rock—which all churchmen swear by—see the cruelty enacted by the good Pilgrim fathers—hanging or banishment if you did not believe in their church and help support it. Roger Williams, one of the finest souls in the colony, to save his scalp was obliged to flee from his Christian savages to the wild savages of the forest for protection, and they protected him all his life—a sad commentary on their Christian religion. Then the persecution of the Quakers—the best of all the Christian sects—and their hanging four on the big elm on Boston Common in 1656 is enough to damn any institution on the earth to-day. To show that the spirit of persecution obtains to-day in the Christian churches I will quote: "On Oct. 13, 1907, at Witherspoon hall, Philadelphia, the Rev. Dr. Robert M. Patterson, a Presbyterian clergyman, said, 'If I had my way about it, I would burn all heretics and blasphemers.'" These words were spoken to an audience composed mostly of clergymen and some few applauded him.

Our Marblehead friend—living so near Plymouth Rock—may have inherited it from his Puritan ancestors. If I was in his place I would try and wash it out before it "struck in."

Your attitude toward the frauds and fakes in our ranks is a just war, and I hope you may long live to throw hot shot and shell, grape and canister into their ranks until they are driven to the tall timber out of commission, and behind the bars, putting in all their time for the state. The ghouls. They should be execrated by all humanity for trifling with the most sacred feelings of the human soul.

Warring Factions of Spiritualists Before Council Committee.

For two hours this morning the warring factions in the ranks of the Spiritualists in this city aired their troubles before the health and police committee of the city council. Some pretty strong language was used by a number of the debaters, and W. Brooks accused Rev. Harrison D. Barrett and Rev. G. C. Love of attempting to secure the passage of an ordinance making it unlawful for any Spiritualist medium to practice mediumship for pay, merely for the purpose of controlling this class of business in this city. He declared that if the proposed ordinance was passed, his opponents would force all other mediums in the city to pay tribute to them.

This accusation was strenuously denied, and the two men accused declared they had no other motive in securing the passage of the proposed ordinance than to protect the general public against alleged clairvoyants and mediums who practiced deceit on the unwary for the purpose of securing their money. Mr. Barrett cited several instances where individuals had been duped by alleged mediums and robbed of many hundred dollars. In one instance he said a man had taken his name at the time he was president of the National Spiritualist Association, and had robbed an elderly woman of $1,300 in Kansas City. He had seen the man since he arrived in Portland, but was unable to bring charges against him.

The warring factions are the National Spiritualist Association, headed in this city by the Rev. Harrison D. Barrett and Rev. G. C. Love, and the Oregon State Spiritualist Association, of which W. Brooks was chief spokesman before the committee to-day. The former are seeking to secure the passage of the ordinance and the latter are fighting against it.—The Evening Telegram, Portland, Oregon, June 5.

INFLUENCE.

Let every soul that bears its part
Through all the walks of life,
Feel that you bear another's gauge,
For love and peace, or strife.

Ah! father, as you firmly clasp,
A small confiding hand,
The tiny feet will e'er keep pace,
And hasten, loiter, stand.

And mother, ever feel these words,
Are murmured soft and low,
"I hold my way, if right or wrong,
As mother used to do."

And, toiler 'neath the burning sun,
Mark well the way you cast
Your seed, for oft they spring and grow,
Within another's breast.

Ye enter in the stream of life,
Too oft with sin replete;
Ah! seek where'er ye float or breast,
To leave it pure and sweet.

For ye will sow, and ye will reap,
But let the harvest show,
To those who still earth's vigils keep,
The path to choose below.

The mountain heights are hard to climb,
Ye may not rest or stand,
But those who toil, and reach the heights,
May view far, far beyond.

And as the purpling shadows fall
Upon thy banner's crest,
Let those below uplook and read;
I ought to do my best.

A MOST EXTRAORDINARY SPIRIT MANIFESTATION.

Psychic Experiences That Occurred a Hundred Years Ago.

The following communication has been sent us by "D. W."

A German writer, Willielm von Kuegelgen, born at the beginning of last century, left a record entitled: "An Old Man's Recollection of his Youth." Among the many interesting subjects referred to in this book, which has never been translated into English, there is but little of a psychic nature; that little, however, will doubtless be of interest to the readers of Light.

After telling of an angelic little sister who died before his birth, the author says:

"But her memory was not buried, and lived as vividly as though she had never died, especially with our mother. And more than her memory; the blessed little sister herself came now and then into the family circle. At least my mother often related how, shortly after each younger child's birth, a form of light was seen shining on and greeting the new arrival. This appearance was not analogous to anything in the material world, yet our mother recognized her spirit child. She had prayed that it might be a guardian angel for any other children that God should send, and she doubted not that her prayer would be granted. Be that as it may, mother had, after my younger sister was born, a witness for this lovely vision, as the nurse, who alone was with her in the room, also saw it. So we often spoke of the departed one, and I well remember that as a small boy I was frequently deterred from wrong-doing by the fear of troubling my angel sister."

While Wilhelm was still a child he was much struck by hearing of a phenomenon, which, at the time, roused general interest, because, as he states, it was considered a final proof of the soul's existence apart from the body. He says:

"A certain young girl had had a tedious illness, from which she at last recovered in a mysterious manner. Her mother, it seems, had made passes over her until the patient fell into a peculiar condition, when her spirit, without the aid of the senses, had a clear perception of the material world, and she had during this clairvoyant state prescribed for herself magnetic treatment which her mother could carry out. A wonderfully strong and tender sympathy was in consequence established between mother and daughter. The two, while becoming more and more closely attached, had, as it were, their soul life in common. During magnetic sleep the invalid could see her mother's spirit glorified beyond description. Strange to say, she always spoke of the death-like magnetic sleep as of being awake, while our normal waking condition she termed eating-sleep. During convalescence, when for the last time in this (according to her) waking state, she lamented bitterly that the vision of her transfigured mother must now be lost to her. 'Only in heaven, mother,' said she, weeping, 'shall I see thee again so beautiful, so supremely beautiful!' The girl is now quite well, and in uninterrupted eating-sleep."

Here ends the quotation from Von Kuegelgen. I find in the book a cutting from Light, date unknown, evidently testimony from the other side, the words being as follows:

"G. B. says: 'I am far clearer on all points than I was whilst shut up in the prisoned body. You see I am more awake than asleep;' and he speaks of those still in the flesh as in 'dream-life,' 'friends sleeping in the material world, you to us are more as we understand sleep'."—Light, London, Eng.

MESSAGES IN NOVELS.

A Heroine Made Out of Faker.

Richard Harding Davis is a writer with considerable talent, and a man more or less original. In his latest book he has gone very far in his effort to find something new, and has made a heroine out of a "faker" who gives seances and lives off the gullibility of rich fools. She is a girl, young and delicate, of marvelous beauty, of great goodness of heart, of highest morality. All these qualities Mr. Davis apparently considers wholly consistent with the heroine's occupation of professional impostor.

It is not a very serious thing, for Mr. Davis' writings are never very serious, but it is very questionable taste to build a heroine out of such material. The book will be widely read because of the author's popularity, and will, conceivably, leave some impression on the minds of the readers.

Which leads to the consideration that the books which nowadays leave any effect worth mentioning are the novels. Americans are too busy to read anything except fiction, and any man who fancies he has a message to deliver must conceal it in a story. The public gobbles up fiction like geese bolting corn scattered in a barnyard. It gets some fodder, but it gets a great deal of extraneous matter, and not a little filth.

For this reason even the lightest hearted and most innocent romancer of the "Dicky" Davis type ought to exercise a certain amount of care about what he puts forth. There is really no harm in Mr. Davis' exultation of occult "fakes," nothing in any way vicious or damaging to public morals. Yet it is safe to predict that some may read a deeper meaning in the frivolous and entertaining tale, and be led to consider humbugs and frauds as a pretty good class of people. One cannot nowadays write a novel that is anything beyond a mere narrative of adventure without being suspected of trying to preach a sermon, teach a lesson, or solve a momentous problem.—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

CHILD MURDER.

A Hideous Doctrine of the Catholic Church.

To the Editor of the Montreal Star:

Sir: I was much interested in "Catholic Theologian's" letter, in which he discusses the injustice of killing an infant to save its mother's life. Perhap some of your readers may be unaware that it is the unanimous belief of the Catholic church that all who are external to Christianity are doomed to eternal damnation, not only on account of their own transgressions, but also on account of the transmitted guilt of Adam, and therefore even the new-born infant is subject to condemnation until baptism has united it to the church. In this connection I quote from the celebrated treatise, "De Fide" of Saint Fulgentius: "Be assured and doubt not that not only men who have obtained the use of their reason, but also little children who have begun to live in their mother's womb and have there died; or who, having just been born, have passed away from the world without the sacrament of holy baptism, must be punished by the eternal torture of undying fire; for although they committed no sin by their own will, they have nevertheless, drawn with them the condemnation of original sin by their carnal conception and nativity." You will thus perceive that it is of more importance to save the child so that it may be baptized rather than the mother, who presumably has already been baptized and whose future is therefore thus assured.

STORM-TOSSED.

A mighty storm is raging wild,
The winds wail out their moan;
Deep thunder's roar is heard afar
Above the spray and foam.

I scarce can face the mighty wind,
My feeble barque is frail;
Yet I must run her past yon light,
And moor her 'gainst the gale.

Heigho! my soul knows naught of fear,
I love a scene thus wild!
And laugh in glee to see her dance
And frolic as a child.

Oh! boat, my pride, dance on! dance on!
The roar of Ocean's wall,
But puts new courage in my heart,
To guide aright the sail.

Ah, ha! Ah, ha! we've passed the bar,
Safe from the bellowing sea!
What others would face with quaking hearts,
Was childish sport to me!

In the Domain of Phenomena.

Interesting and Suggestive Experiences With So-Called Ghosts, as Related by Rev. J. C. F. Grumbine, a Prominent Lecturer, Author and Medium.

This narrative must of necessity be autobiographical, because no record of psychical phenomena and experiences can be useful to either the historian or the scientist, unless it be the diary of a life. Psychical phenomena deal with incarnate and excarnate personalities, functioning on the normal and supernormal planes of being. Immortality is a personal matter.

The science of psychology, though it is loth to accept these seemingly sporadic and disconnected phenomena as within the operation of physical law, still cannot, and in fact, does not dismiss them as having no place in its ever widening field of investigation. Psychical research and immortality fall within the sphere of the personal life and the personality, in this new and virgin field of inquiry. This field has been termed the supernormal, not because supernormal phenomena occur outside the domain of natural causality, but because they are not explicable by any of the known laws of matter and mind. Such phenomena as arrest or suspend the operation of natural law, do not transgress either natural or supernormal law.

Now these phenomena must grow out of and fall within the conscious sphere of the soul's life if they are to prove immortality, or demonstrate the survival of the personal identity after the change called death, and the possibility of intercommunication between the two worlds. This, of course, could not be possible or practical, if the personality died with the dissolution of the material body and the extinguishment of the soul's ego.

With Spiritualism as an hypothesis of the new psychology and of the cause and origin of all psychical phenomena, nothing at present will be said, and for the reason that as a world movement, Spiritualism is undoubtedly a great historical and spiritual fact, and as a scientific hypothesis, is the best and only one sufficient to explain all the facts, as Sir Oliver Lodge, Flammarion, Wallace and the late Gerald Massey admitted, but this narrative, in order to make clear its claims to the attention of the investigator, must be a straightforward and simple recital of facts. Facts are stubborn things, and it is because they are facts that they refuse to be ignored. Now the important matter about the facts is our relation to them. Personally we may deny or ignore them, but science is duty bound to accept them. Whoever glosses them over with the verbiage of misunderstanding, fearful lest some one might accuse him of telling the truth, may be a clever word juggler, and conceal his cowardice under such subterfuge, but he forgets that such action makes him lose even his own self-respect. Truth is always stranger than fiction, and art to serve the truth must not forget that a lie can never become the truth. In the spirit of history and science, I hope to tell my story.

While a clergyman of the Unitarian denomination in a church located a short distance west of Chicago, I became deeply interested in psychical phenomena. In the year 1893 the Psychical Research Society was still young, but powerful. I became a member of the American branch and began my personal researches in Spiritualism. It is hard to realize, much harder to accept the fact that there is a time for every thing under the sun, and that we cannot force that time nor can we hope to drive an hypothenuse across a triangular fate until the hour has come. Our interest in the occult must await just such a time. It was in the year 1893 when my interest in the phenomena of modern Spiritualism seized me, and led me for the first time to attend a seance of a professional medium, vouched for by a very honest and strong-minded parishioner. At this particular seance, under the most rigorous and scientific test conditions, the most extraordinary phenomena took place. There were spirit voices, independent slate writings, materializations of luminous hands, levitation of musical instruments, clouds of light, the windings of a large music box, and all this while the sitters, some ten in number, held hands and were also aware of the hands of the psychic all the while. This is what is generally known as a seance for general phenomena. At this seance I received the following two messages, written on an ordinary block of paper or writing pad, and torn by the spirit and placed, either in our coat pocket or in our laps.

First Message.

"My Dear Boy: Many years have passed since I last spoke to you in a voice which you could hear, but let me assure you that the intervening time has not been spent far apart from your life. For as life is eternal, so is a mother's love everlasting. All the changes in your life I have taken cognizance of, and so, often in your thoughtful moments I have tried to reach you, and help you to ponder the questions which you have been clamoring to answer. Now the darkened clouds of your existence begin to pass away; the true light of the after life begins to dawn; and you feel the mastering of thought and knowledge. This same thought you may attribute to divine inspiration, for so it is. You have been led to this thought and investigation by the higher intelligences, and so you will be led, until day by day and hour by hour, your own spirit will so broaden as to enable you to impart that knowledge to the many hungering, suffering souls on earth. In this you will find an earth mission appointed you from highest principles. LOVING MOTHER."

Second Message.

From a reverend friend:

"In days gone by when we were pressed too closely we were taught to say that there is a mystery in godliness which no human mind can fathom; so our eyes were blinded and reason set at naught. But the great law of evolution has carried us onward and upward, until we find within us the Divine principle of God and a close correspondence of our own soul with the great Over-soul. We learn also that the little things confound the mighty, that this little pencil moved by spirit power will prove to you the everlasting progress of the soul, which is possible for all to reach in these communications.

"A REVEREND FRIEND."

Third Message.

"My Dear Friend and Reverend Brother: This evening I am granted the privilege of soul communion with you through the expression of this, your earth instrument. And in spirit life, I, too, must employ a like instrument, that you in earth life have not, the clearness of vision or comprehension to understand; yet through the two avenues we meet, as it were, face to face and exchange thought for thought.

"In earth life my eyes were blinded to the truth. I would not see the light, and now I feel more fully the necessity and the desire to impart light and comfort to mortals who are now treading the same pathway. As I view the ignorance and superstition of mortals I wonder, and I feel an overwhelming spirit and enthusiasm to awaken them to the realization of that which I, through experience, know to be true.

"The language that I must employ to give expression to you of my soul unfoldment, its thought and experience, or, that you will be able to comprehend, is inadequate far, to that which is real, but as your language is to the infant, I will give you that which in part I realized.

"As the ebbtide of life grew less, so I felt the spirit quicken, until I realized a perfect newness of life, so surging with exquisite joy, that every attribute of spirit came to me—that which mortals call a part of God. So calm and so beautiful in their perfection were all things that met my gaze, and so loving, tender, and gentle were the friends who approached me, that I recognized at once that surely this is a part of heaven, more truly beautiful than ever had come to my thought. And so as I awakened to all the light around me, and was given the first lesson of my new condition, I then realized the truth of the after life, and knew that I had done wrong in condemning without knowledge. Now I find pleasure in learning the spiritual laws of the spiritual universe, yet find equal pleasure in returning and imparting knowledge and light to mortals of earth, all of whom must meet with the same change through the same atmosphere and condition. All must be their own judge and so qualify themselves by the condition and the circumstances of their earthly life.

"I am your reverend friend and brother, J. H. HARTER."

As to the above messages, the first two came at the first seance, and were written in lead pencil, while the latter was gotten on a typewriter, run by invisible power and written in the dark. It was rattled off faster than the fastest expert could do it on a machine in the light, and under the most favorable circumstances. Mr. Stead and Mr. Yost can bear witness to the accuracy of this statement, for during the World's Fair they conducted experiments with the same medium in a steel cage and received messages just the same. Rev. J. H. Harter was at one time a Universalist clergyman, when I was a member of the same denomination, and it was I who, at the quest of his widow officiated at his funeral. In northern New York he was known as the minister of the "Church of the Divine Fragments." It was not strange that at this crisis in my own life he should appear, and break the silence of so many years by flashing out these messages on my consciousness as similar messages were written in independent writing on the walls of the palace of Belshazzar.

There is, as any one who is familiar with psychical phenomena knows, a vast range of manifestations, and an equally numerous expression of spirit power through mediumship. Independent slate writing or psychography is one of the most fascinating and intelligent expressions of spirit power, and always puzzles the skeptic and agnostic. These messages were not, strictly speaking, slate writings, but they occurred independently of any apparatus, and as such are certainly marvelous phenomena. And yet it is not remarkable that spirits who survive the change called death, should be able to write in this peculiar way, since while on earth they could read and write. The actual wonder would be that all that they knew was so soon forgotten because of the change called death. These simple means of communication show how deeply rooted in the very soil of being is our human life and its intelligence. That incorporeal beings did and could write as here maintained is an experience which goes far toward proving that the scientists and the mass of people who believe in the possibility of communication between the two worlds, are not insane as so many supposed. J. H. Harter had been in the spirit world some fifteen years and was able to write. He seemed glad to again greet me across the Great Divide.

Elizabth Barrett Browning in Casa Guida in Summerland.

I attended a seance in the city of Chicago in November, 1893, in response to a desire which I had had for a long time to secure a book of poems by Mrs. Elizabeth Browning, containing a certain photo or print from a photo, which in my youth had made a strong impression on me. The book was out of print, but I thought perhaps that she, a spirit, might know where I might secure such a copy. I of course did not expect what followed. Mrs. Browning passed away in the year 1861. If she existed in the spirit world, she of course could give me the information desired. The medium, a very amiable and beautiful woman, gave me every opportunity, not only to test her power of mediumship, but to please me in the matter of test conditions. I must have facts and not fraud. So she sat the her table, where I was to receive messages from the so-called dead, and transmitted by a psychic process, more simple than wireless telegraphy, called psychography. After we sat for a few moments, I was requested to take up one of the questions I had previously written and placed on the table, a question, the contents of which I at least, knew nothing about. Presently, as I held with the right hand the slate, which was placed under the side of the table, I distinctly heard scratching. This continued for some time. When the message was finished, I placed the slate on the table and read this message:

"As soon as material cares and duties are laid aside, a letter comes inspired by mother."

The question I had asked was, "Will I receive a reply to the letter I had posted to your son."

In previous correspondence I had learned that Robert Barrett Browning was living in Venice. This information was given me by the New York Sun. Through another message the spirit of Mrs. Browning substantiated the statement that her son was alive and was living across the waters.

The letter I had sent to Robert Barrett Browning was about this book, containing the picture of his mother. Now here was a distinct prophecy. The son would make a reply, inspired by mother, and Mrs. Browning was to reach her son, inspire him to write a letter to me, and tell about the picture. Some two months following this seance, while again returning from Chicago to my home, I was handed a letter, postmarked the old world, and on opening it I found it was from Robert Barrett Browning, and contained a photo of his mother, "One of the last," he said, "she had taken." The sending of this photo was the remarkable fact not foretold, but no doubt inspired by the mother, who wished me to have a memorial of my appreciation of her poetic works.

Here was a case, more significant than mind reading or telepathy, for the medium knew nothing at all about the Brownings, and certainly could not tell if she had a son who was living across the waters, and that Mrs. Browning would inspire him to reply to my letter. Some years afterward I learned that Mr. Barrett Browning was most difficult to get at, and this information was conveyed to me by Lilian Whiting. Once when I surmised that Mrs. Browning's hair was black, she, the spirit, informed me through another medium that it was not black but brown," and "that Robert, her husband, called her his Brownie." And this fact I substantiated later on by seeing, among the gifts which the late Kate Field left to Lilian Whiting, a lock of her hair which was brown.

Miss Whiting, long before she wrote a life of Mrs. Browning, had been assured that it was her wish that she should write it, and it was Mrs. Browning's own spirit that had impelled the writer to inform Miss Whiting of Mrs. Browning's wish. It led to a hurried visit to the old country and to Italy, and later to the writing of the book, entitled, "A Study of Elizabeth Barrett Browning." This biography is the only adequate and unprejudiced story of her beautiful life. The reason why other biographies were not satisfactory is not so clear and obvious. Mrs. Browning was a Spiritualist, as most of her biographers knew, but thought it was an act of kindness to her memory not to mention it, or considered it no business of the public to know, as it might detract from her glory, or fame, if known. Mrs. Browning wishes the truth published, and so authorized Miss Whiting from the spirit side to give to the world a truthful narrative.

A strange incident associated with her Spiritualism is this. Some years ago, before this book was written, I received from an elderly gentleman in St. Louis, at a social, a photograph of the late D. D. Home, the celebrated American medium, who startled Europe by his remarkable phenomena. This man said to me: "I get the impression from Daniel Home that he wishes me to give this to you, because he says you will understand and appreciate it. I did. For it was at a seance given for Mrs. and Robert Browning at a lady's home in Italy that she was converted to Spiritualism. D. D. Home was the medium. What part Mrs. Browning and D. D. Home played in this affair as excarnate spirits, who can tell? Another fact which deserves mention is, that in the biography of Mrs. Browning by Lilian Whiting the very picture I had sought forms the frontispiece. And this was inserted without any knowledge on my part, and of course, without any previous arrangement on the part of Miss Whiting.

Doctor Morrell MacKenzie, of London, as a Spirit Doctor.

A more striking manifestation of spirit power I was soon to witness through the same channel. The seance was for independent slate writing, and consisted of the usual questions, prepared by myself, and placed, without the medium's reading them, on top of the table where the spirit would advise which one it cared to consider by rapping three times when I took one up, and once, for no. The conditions were test, as I had carefully examined the slates, the room, the table and kept my eyes wide open all the time. I had felt that I needed some neutralizing medicine, as my stomach and kidneys were slightly indisposed. That very morning I had gone to a local physician, received a prescription, which I had had filled in Chicago. When I took my seat at the table the question of my condition was uppermost in my mind, and luckily the question of my health was the first one to come up for consideration. The reply was, "Use bi-carbonate of soda." In my haste to copy the prescription, that is, the entire message, I omitted to add "bi" to the carbonate of soda. This evidently had to be, for on going to the druggist and asking for some carbonate of soda—(why that, I do not know, as I knew better, unless it was to lead up consistently to what followed)—he said, "What do you want it for?" I replied, "To drink."

"Well, you do not want washing soda, as that will kill you, but bi-carbonate."

"Of course," I said. But I thought deeply of the message and the doctor on the spirit side of life, who prescribed it. So when I reached the house of the medium, I asked her the moment the door was opened what she and the spirit doctor were trying to do,—"to poison me!"

"Why, what is the matter?"

"The doctor advised me to take carbonate of soda. That's poison."

"Indeed, let's go back and read or reread the slate and see if you correctly copied it."

"A moment," I said, "you have a sitter."

"I?"

"Why, yes."

For that very instant I saw a form of a gentleman, of advanced years, with frock coat, black bow tie (string), mutton chop whiskers, florid complexion, rather bald head, as I now remember him, and of medium build, standing back of her. The form made a strong impression on me, as it was so life-like. "And," I added, "he has gone through the hall, and back of the draperies into your room." She turned instantly pale, and trembled.

"Impossible," she murmured as she hastened through the hall, behind the draperies, into the room and followed by me, who all the while seemed bewildered by the unique spectacle. On entering the room, we found there no one but ourselves. We read, however, the message together. It was correct, and called distinctly for bi-carbonate of soda and nothing else.

That evening the medium was to give a private seance for materialization which only a few of my friends were to attend. Now mark what appeared. That very form, which I and not the medium had seen in the hall, and which vanished so mysteriously into air, again manifested at the cabinet curtain, while the medium was in a trance,—the same person in the exact clothes, wearing the string tie and mutton chop whiskers, and seemingly of flesh and blood, spoke to me these words: "I come to you to-night as I came to you this morning, to assure you that I wish to be as accurate in prescribing from this side of life as I was when in the earth form. Good night."

He then disintegrated into vacuity. This person was no less a distinguished personage than Doctor Morrell MacKenzie, late physician to Her Majesty, Queen Victoria of England. And strange to add, on a news stand a few weeks later I picked up a magazine, and, in looking through the advertisements, who should I see in a group of faces recommending a certain tonic but that of Doctor Morrell MacKenzie, who appeared just as I had seen him on that day I held the seance.

TRENCHANT SCINTILLATIONS.

As They Emanate from the Pen of R. A. Dague in an "Open Letter" to the Noted Evangelist, Mr. Taylor.

Creston, Iowa.

Dear Mr. Taylor: I was much interested in your public address yesterday to business men at the tent. I endorse much that you said but do not endorse all. I cannot agree with you when you advise business men to get down on their knees and pray for large sales and big profits, and for earthly riches.

You said 'we ought to pray to God to give us profit and riches." Now, Brother Taylor, "profit" means to get something for nothing. If I make a profit off the labor of my employe I take from him, without equivalent compensation, a part of what he has earned and what justly belongs to him. Prayer for profit, for riches, is selfish and mercenary. My prayer is to be assisted in becoming less selfish—to give more than I receive. Do you think you did right by that poor working girl you mentioned, who worked for you who had the skill to make superior cakes, by yourself taking a profit of $45 weekly, and giving her but $5.00. My friend, do you not know that the Golden Rule can never be carried out under the present greedy competitive industrial system? Under the Socialist system it could be but not under a system in which the motto is: "Every fellow for himself and let satan take the hindmost."

I think you were unhappy in holding up to young men to be patterned after, Mr. Armour, of embalmed beef notoriety, and Mr. Carnegie, who acquired many millions by watering steel stocks and whose treatment of his employes caused twenty-six of them to be shot dead like dogs, at Homestead, Pa., for striking for a trifling advance in wages.

Don't let us advise young men to pray for profit, for riches, and try to become Armours and Carnegies by robbing honest working men of a large portion of the product of their labor, but let us teach them to pray for a spirit which will prompt them to so love their fellow men that they will desist from exploiting them to refrain from battering the heads of their employes by policemen's clubs and from shooting out their hearts by Pinkerton rifles when they go on a peaceful strike for better conditions.

You struck the right chord at the close of your speech when you said, in effect, that certain employers whom you named, conducted their business on the co-operative and profit-sharing plan were the most successful.

With this I send you, with my compliments, a copy of my late pamphlet on "What is Capitalism, What is Socialism?" I hope you may give it a careful reading. I assure you I am yours for the betterment of humanity.

R. A. DAGUE.

May 25, 1908.

Editor American, Creston, Iowa: I sent a letter of which the foregoing is a copy, to Evangelist Taylor; also my pamphlet on the 15th. As I received no acknowledgements of them, and as the letter deals with matters of interest to the public, I herewith present you with a copy of my letter. Doubtless our evangelist friends have done some good in Creston. I hope they have. I would not knowingly say one word that would tend to undo any good they have done. Many good things were spoken from the tent rostrum; I regret, however, that slighting allusions were made about Christian Scientists, Universalists, Unitarians, New Thoughters and other liberal sects. Now, I am not a Christian Scientist, but I confess I do like their statement of faith better that I do that of the so-called orthodox. The Scientists do not believe that there is an all-powerful umbiquitous satan, who so thwarted and upset God's plans that God had to drown the entire human family except Noah and his family. They do not believe that satan had so out-generaled God that the only way God could be prevented from torturing countless millions of his own children in hell forever, was for His Son (who was God Himself) to be killed, thus making atonement for the sins of the world, and that through this blood-spilling, bad men might, by a mere belief, escape all the consequences of a wicked life, and by one great leap go to the highest seats in heaven, and eternally wear a crown of glory, and endlessly play a harp, while the average moral people, who did not understand the "plan," and who occasionally went to the theatre, and now and then played a game of euchre or seven-up, if unbaptized, would be tortured in hell forever. Now, I believe in religion myself and am a member of a church, but I want a religion of common sense—one that teaches that every man shall be rewarded according to his deeds, instead of creeds. The old puritanic teaching about an endless hell to which God sends the larger number of his children, is unthinkable, unreasonable and blasphemous. It don't go any longer except in the back rural districts. There must and will be punishment for wrong doing in this and the next world, but it will not be wrathful and vindictive and unrelenting, but will be corrective and educational. No lessons in God's great school can be skipped, merely because the Jews killed Jesus. There is merit in the life and teachings of Jesus Christ, but no merit in his cruel death and shed blood.

There is but little in a name. Russia is Christian in name but she horrifies all civilization by her savage, brutal, murderous, atrocities. Japan is pagan and challenges the admiration of the world by her humanity and kindness.

In conclusion let me modestly say to my zealous and well-disposed evangelist brethren at the tent, that I am a lay preacher myself. Come, brethren, let us thunder more and louder at the bloody crimes committed by the Russian Christians against the unoffending. Jews. Let us go after the greedy, grasping monopolists and the heartless plutocrats who, by stock watering, corrupting the ballot, and other high crimes, are exploiting millions of honest people and destroying the republic. Let us denounce these things. Let us expose the profligacy, debauchery, licentiousness and hypocrisy of the "400," most of whom are professing Christians, in our great cities. Let us raise a thunderous protest against the enslaving of two million tender children in our mills and factories. Let us follow the example of Jesus by championing the cause of the poor, the homeless, the friendless, the destitute, the disheartened—the great multitudes who are crowded into the slums and to the verge of despair by the unchristian, greedy, competitive industrial system. Let us do something for our unfortunate fellowmen besides giving them religious tracts and exhorting them to "come to Jesus." Let us fearlessly tell Rockefeller, Morgan, Ryan and other pious exploiters of their fellow men, that they cannot, through munificent donations to rich churches, buy high seats in the big courts of heaven.

In short, let us with our big sticks get after the big sins and the big sinners. After we have done them up, we may then give more fatherly advice to the dear sisters who are so wicked as to jeopardize their souls' salvation when, for an afternoon's rest and recreation, they congregate in their neighbor's parlor and drink tea, eat bad candy, talk about the lovely merry-widow hats and play euchre.

One of the misfortunes, brethren, of our evangelistic preaching is that we picture both God and the devil as being in partnership, and we present them as such awful beings that we frighten innocent school girls and nervous, sensitive, tender-hearted folks, making them think they are such horrible sinners and damned reprobates, that sometimes they worry till they go insane, while the hard-headed, stiff-necked old codgers with a lot of common sense don't believe our preaching. They cannot be convinced that this infinite universe, with its countless billions of suns and worlds, are run and sustained as we think they are.

I assure you, brethren, I am sincerely your brother and co-worker in the cause for the betterment of our fellow-men. R. A. DAGUE.

QUESTIONS ASKED

And Answered by Mrs. M. Klein, of Van Wert, Ohio.

1. Spiritual mediums and their labors—in what way do they differ from other mortals?

Answer.—The difference lies in their archetypal make-up. A true spiritual medium must represent a musical instrument or a telegraph instrument. The class or quality of messages turned out lies in part with the instrument and in part with the operator, who must be skilled to perperform this great and noble duty well. However, when the instrument is out of order, the best operator cannot give perfect messages.

There are many sensitives in this age of the world who come not under this rule, but by reason of their sensitiveness, come in touch with those who, by death, have crossed the dividing lines, and thereby the fact is established that all worlds and their inhabitants are linked together and inter-active; that it is a natural procedure in the order of cause and effect. Also it is proof positive that all persons are mediums in one way or another, but not all are so gifted as to figure as spiritual mediums.

2. What is the Divine Purpose of spiritual mediumship?

It is to impart knowledge of such things as are helpful and enhance the general weal to earth's people. Then, too, it opens up mental commerce with the immortal worlds in a comprehensible and well-defined way. It invigorates the world brain for a fitness and reception of ideas, to facilitate plans for better methods of labor, show man how to utilize nature's forces, extract the stored wealth from her inner stores and in the near future change the entire face of heaven and earth, since, by virtue of this imported wisdom, man is enabled to learn himself and his rights better and to become qualified to comply with the Creator's will in the service he renders to man and things in general.

3. What do you mean by the Spiritual Philosophy?

Cicero's definition would answer here; he said: "Philosophy when rightly defined is nothing but the love of wisdom." All true investigators of the spiritual philosophy desire to learn more of themselves, more of God's will, their rights and their duties, and, in Solomon's words, with all their getting, get wisdom. However, it is a very fine point to discover WHERE and HOW the knowledge so obtained begins and is changed into wisdom, for sometimes man thinks himself in possession of weighty truths so obtained and feels that he is very wise, but lo! a turn of things, and still clearer revelations prove him in error. Therefore we define true wisdom to mean that which elevates and enriches the soul and helps other souls upward by furnishing them helpful experiences.

All honest labor is means to ends for the gathering of knowledge by and through true experiences. This knowledge is converted into wisdom by making it practical, thus securing its values. Thus the status of the world and people is improved. It is the proper order through which thoughts and ideas must pass to become immortalized by the interchange of mind and substance in accordance with universal rules.

4. Why do inquirers hold different views on these things which makes it hard for a common mind to discern which is truth and which error?

It is the worldly students who, though intellectual and somewhat scientific, yet have no truly spiritual unfoldment and conception, create these conflicting ideas and theories. They, not being able to penetrate into the inner spiritual life, theorize altogether upon cosmic operations finitely beheld and making some discoveries, imagine that they have discovered the very secrets of creation, and both talk and write glibly about evolution, etc., but they will all learn that their theories will not bear them out when the true order is revealed to man.

We know that the study of evolution in connection with geological unfoldments is a fascinating and also a beneficial study when man does not lose his balance while thus eagerly exploring, but recognizes that these evolutions mark the footsteps of God; that his voice is in the voices of angels and mortals and all nature and all living things declare his wisdom; that therefore man should rightly use all things and abuse none, since all is but to aid him in his moral and spiritual attainments.

5. What do you mean by the potency of thought?

We have instructed here from time to time on this subject and are pleased to see inquiry aroused, also that much is talked and written in general upon it. We say thought is the moulder of men and nations. It has a potency for good and evil. It affects each one's own personality as much as it does others. Hatred, if extensively indulged in, in thought, vitiates blood and affects the heart. It causes disease and untimely death. When ill thoughts are centered upon weak individuals, they succumb to the pressure and ill results are inevitable. Pure thoughts, O what power for good and upliftment! Pure thoughts are the whisperings of God's spirit through mortal brains, they are the prayers of the soul; they are the benedictions of love and good will breathed out upon humanity, and perform the grand mission of turning hate into love, and misery into joy and comforts. Good thoughts are the celestial breathings of the atmosphere of paradise, thus become the wings wherewith to soar to celestial heights and sip nectar with the gods.

MOST REMARKABLE CASE

Joins Dead Sister at Spirit's Call.—Aged Maine Women's Lives End Same Day Under Remarkable Circumstances.—Both Buried Together.—"Come, Sister, You Must Follow Me," Miss Perham Heard Dead Mrs. Davis Call.

Greenwood, Me., June 6.—How Mrs. Edward Davis and Miss Perham, sisters and companions through life, died on the same day and how one preceded the other to the spirit world and returned to summon the other is to-day being told far and wide by neighbors and friends here who are familiar with the story of the strange circumstances.

So remarkable is the life and death story of these two sisters that it is told in whispers. Mrs. Edward Davis was seventy years of age, while Miss Perham, her sister, was seventy-three. After Mr. Davis died the sisters lived alone in the isolated cottage for many years. They became firm believers in Spiritualism and psychic control.

Wife Joins Helpmeet.

Mrs. Davis told her sister just one week before her death that one night as she lay in her bed her husband had appeared to her. He had talked with her and as he was about to disappear bade her join him in the land beyond the grave. She said that he had told her all about the life unseen and that they had set the day for her death. She said she longed to join her husband.

The following Monday was the day appointed. Two days before that time Mrs. Davis fell ill. She spoke cheerfully of the future life into which she was about to enter.

"Good-bye," she whispered to Miss Perham. "To-day you must follow me so that we will all be together."

Miss Perham went into the orchard to gather appleblossoms for which Mrs. Davis had asked, saying that these were the only flowers she wished to have at her funeral and on her grave.

As Miss Perham stood under a tree in the orchard and was reaching for the clusters of blooms, she seemed to suddenly see her sister standing smiling at her side.

"Come, Sister; Join Us!"

"Come, sister," Mrs. Davis said. "It is time for you to join us. I am so happy; come!"

Before Miss Perham could pick up the blossoms which had dropped from her nerveless hands Mrs. Davis had vanished and she was alone. On entering the house she found her sister's dead body lying on the bed. A peaceful smile rested on her face.

Neighbors came to prepare for the burial and the undertaker was summoned. Before the plans for the single funeral were completed Miss Perham fell ill and she died in a few hours, and the sisters were laid to rest side by side in the little cemetery here.—Boston American.

SPIRITUALISM A RELIGION OF LIFE.

So Says Miss Florence Morse, in a Lecture Published in the Two Worlds, Manchester, Eng.

We have chosen as the topic of the address it is to be our privilege to offer you this evening, the subject, "Spiritualism; a Religion of Life." Too often is Spiritualism considered—if it is thought of as a religion at all—to be simply a religion that deals entirely with the future state of humanity, and so, in that sense, may be said to be considered more as a religion of death, or the after-life, than one having much bearing upon life in the ordinary physical sense of that word. We know, of course, that this familiar aspect of Spiritualism is one that has a clear and definite place in the thought and attention of those who investigate into the claim of the truth of modern Spiritualism, for, after all, men and women are living in the physical life, they know its conditions, they know much concerning it, and it is little to be wondered that they have used their religions in the past, and should continue to do so in the present, more as a means of finding something out concerning the future state, whether it exists, and when they are satisfied upon that point, they want to know what its condition may be.

Men always turn more to the unknown, to those things that are outside and beyond their ordinary daily experiences of life, and although it is well to do so, it is also well to consider what belongs to the physical life, what is its duty, and what are the conditions that are best suited to it.

Spiritualism, therefore, has this double meaning: It has a double relationship; the relationship to man's immortal spiritual life and its conditions after the death of the physical body; and its relation to the conditions of this, the mortal life, while he is still treading its pathway, while its lessons are still to be learned, while its opportunities are to be taken, and its mistakes and follies to be avoided.

Spiritualism, then, is a religion of life here, while the ordinary forces of daily life are in progress, and while you go about your daily duties and pleasures. It is true that Spiritualism has a relationship to them, and can and does spiritualize these duties and pleasures, and brings you more into touch with the higher, loftier side of your nature, its expression and aspirations. Concerning, then, the ordinary life of the world, religion in any sense has a very clear and distinct part to play. Too long, it seems to us, has it been a matter for consideration upon one day of the week only, and those lives that have been lived in this world, which were best, highest, purest and noblest in their exxpressions of self-unfoldment, self-forgetfulness, helpfulness to their fellows, have been those lives where the religion of the person (no matter what that religion may have been) has been the dominating power and influence working through that person, expressing itself in unselfishness, in the mental and spiritual development of the person. This, we think, everyone will readily recognize, and will see the force of what we say when we suggest that Spiritualism, in its broad and true religious sense, dealing, as it undoubtedly does in its higher aspects, with the spiritual nature of all that is pure and refined in the heart and soul of each one of its followers, should excreise this same lofty influence, and thereby bring into the moral life, bring into the confused and inharmonious conditions that pertain too often in the world, that one touch of spiritual power which shall call to the surface that spark of Divine life that is within each one of you.

Man lacks spiritual expression; man's religious life too often is a thing for one or two days in the week, and yet, deep down in the nature of each one, there is that instinctive feeling, that recognition of higher, purer, truer powers that can help all to over-ride the selfishness that is developed by the conditions of physical life; to override that disregard of others, that placing of self and self-interest before all other considerations. That feeling, or, as some say, the power of conscience, is the power that works through all mortal beings, the power that springs from the central point of life, God Himself.

Spiritualism comes into your lives as a religion whose teaching is clear and distinct upon many points concerning action, thought, and motive; not based upon the idea of any one person or set of persons, not speaking with the authority of those who are in place and position, and who should, because of that position, know of what they speak, but coming to you directly from those people who can tell you of the influence of spiritual matters upon your lives (and their effect again upon your spiritual natures) as the result of their own experience in the mortal life. And they tell you that your religion of life, your religion of Spiritualism, should first of all teach you to realize—nay, not teach you, but prove to you—the fact of your spiritual nature and its powers while you are here in the physical life. They are the people who speak to you; those who have sat by your side in the past, those whom you know, in whose word and truth and honor you have every confidence, in whom you had every trust, and whom you know would tell you of spiritual matters, could they come from the life beyond, in such words and with such power and force that you would be compelled to realize their truth when you listened to their words.

A PATHETIC SCENE.

A Venerable Lady Lives Her Life Over Again, Just as Death Calls.

According to the Chicago Record-Herald, Mrs. Emily A. Graham, who came to Chicago a few months after Fernando Jones, died yesterday, after a brief illness, at her home, 5223 Madison avenue.

Delirium which came upon the aged woman during the last week of her life took her back to that period when Chicago was a frontier trading post lost in leagues of virgin forest. The teeming, cosmopolitan city, with its crashing elevated lines, its busy markets, its hurrying thousands, no longer existed for her. The approaching dimness of death had already blotted these things from her consciousness.

From the windows of her sickroom she saw, in fancy, the wilderness stretching back from the huddled group of houses that made up the old Fort Dearborn. Continually she stetched forth her hands and begged to be taken out into the free air.

She fancied herself again a child in the streets of the trading post. She talked again with the little Indian children who had been her playmates in that far away time and started with fear as she imagined she saw the painted visages of the grown braves of the tribe.

"Look," she would cry, "look; don't you see the smoke over that tepee? That is where I played yesterday. I played there until the chief came home, but when he put his hand on my head I ran. And then we went paddling in the lake.

"Let me take the pappoose. I'll not hurt him. I can hold him. He's a little fellow and he has such funny eyes. Let me have him."

Then she would wander to the thoughts of the forest and fancied herself plucking flowers and running and hiding in the brush. The last week of her life was a complete return to the days of her childhood, and she recalled the faces and names of many of the oldest settlers of Chicago, most of whom now are dead.

Although her last illness was brief, she was unable to attend the recent gathering of early settlers who met to celebrate Fernando Jones' eighty-ninth birthday.

LAUGHTER AND HEALTH.

The Important Part They Play in the Life of Every Individual.

Writing in the Daily Chronicle of April 27 a "Physician" says: "If it were generally understood how salutary the act of laughing is to the bodily health, there might be more laughter than lamentation in the world, and farcical comedies prove more attractive to the invalid than physicians.

He thinks people grow fat because they laugh—laughing promotes appetite, oxidizes the blood, assists digestion, produces the contented body, the fit temple of the contented mind which is said to be a perpetual feast. There is, therefore, distinct benefit to be derived from being able to see the humorous side of men and things.

The Chronicle's "Physician" further says:

"Mental worries, real or imaginary, will so prevent nutrition, through the influence of mind on body, as to produce wasting of the muscular system and those other tissues which subserve it. If a melancholy man would look on the lighter side of life, and laugh a little more, his appetite and digestion would improve, and he would be able to acquire that minimum amount of fat which is necessary to the well-being of the body—fat being a necessary constituent of the healthy brain and nervous system. The laughing habit is one, therefore, that is worth cultivating. It is a matter of everyday experience that one feels the better for a good laugh, an explosion of laughter being, in truth, a nerve-storm, comparable in its effect to a thunderstorm (on a very small scale), doing good by dissipating those oppressive clouds of care which sometimes darken the mental horizon."

Letter from Mrs. Nellie S. Baade.

Again I ask for permission to write a short article regarding our spiritual work in Milwaukee, Wis., which, so far as we know, was considered a success, although during March Rev. Fay Mills created quite a sensation in the opera house with his lectures regarding Spiritualism and kindred subjects, with his wonderful magnetic powers. So little understood by the audiences, they did as he willed them to do, unconsciously to themselves; as one lady expressed herself to me: "We simply could not help ourselves." Of course these meetings drew from our audiences a class of people who were anxious to hear what the late orthodox evangelist had to say, and classes were organized to teach them something supposed to be higher and better than the spiritual philosophy; but from observation I do not think Spiritualism has suffered in comparison, but it has been the means of testing the strength and integrity of character of all concerned. During this excitement the guides of the medium, president of the society in their own home, gave independent writing upon the slates under the feet of the sitters, where there was no room for doubt or fraud, showing conclusively they would never leave or forsake the honest seekers after truth.

The last Sunday evening of our engagement with them, in behalf of Unity Society, I was presented with a beautiful bouquet of carnations, Ex-Congressman Smith making the presentation speech as he alone could make it, filled with kindest thought and the good wishes of all. Although the flowers have faded and passed away, the fragrance and the life in the floral kingdom will live forever, and enshrined in memory's casket they will remain a thing of beauty and a joy forever.

The only thing that caused me sincere regret was the lack of interest in our spiritual literature, but before I came away several promised they would subscribe for The Progressive Thinker, also took the names of the premium books with which they hoped to start a spiritual library.

I expect to be home during June, July and August. Shall attend to camp work. Have a few open dates for the winter months. Any one desirous of securing my services can communicate with me at my present address.

First Spiritual Union, Norwich, Conn.

The twenty-sixth annual meeting of the First Spiritual Union of Norwich, Conn., was held on Tuesday evening, June 2, a large number being present.

The reports of the officers were heard and approved, and showed the society to have closed a successful season's work with no indebtedness upon their books.

The old board of management were re-elected. Secretary, Mary P. Clapp; treasurer, Wm. F. Bogue; auditors, Henry Bellows and H. R. Hayes; speakers' committee, Wm. F. Bogue, Mr. and Mrs. Nathan Brewster, Mrs. R. A. Jennings and Robert B. Harker; music committee, Mrs. M. E. Trout, Mrs. A. Gould and Mrs. C. J. Edgerton.

The Union Dramatic Club presented the play, "The Song of the Church Bells," a local setting, and written by a Norwich boy, May 28 and 29. They have earned for themselves as amateurs a high reputation for the excellence of their work and have contributed very materially to the support of the Union by the proceeds from the different plans presented by them. They are to put on the play in Fitchville, Baltic and Willimantic in the immediate future, and at Lake Pleasant and Amherst in August.

The Lyceum has closed for the summer and will hold their third annual picnic at Lincoln park Saturday, June 27.

Mr. Albert P. Blinn, who has served us as resident speaker for the past three years, and has greatly endeared himself to us as a people by his genial characteristics and unselfish devotion to our cause, and who has been gifted with a high and uplifting inspiration, giving us the highest and best thought, week after week, will return the coming season.

He and his good wife are earnest workers, and to them we as a society owe much, and are looking forward to another season of success under their cheery and unselfish guidance.

MARY P. CLAPP,
Norwich, Conn. Secretary.

FANCIES.

This morning while lying in bed,
After night's slumbers were done,
A thousand sweet fancies came into my head
Which, like birds, flew away, one by one.

A melody came to my heart—
A breath from the Isles of the Blest—
Of Heaven's sweet life of which our life's a part,
That brought me an infinite rest.

It was crooned o'er the lap of the race
And to the first infant that smiled,
Though sometimes translated in hate or in grace
Still lives in the heart of the child.

We call it a fancy, but true
How little we know of the Thought
That surrounds us as the sky's fadeless blue,
With wonders and mysteries fraught.

No matter how brief is the stay
Of fancies we think so unreal,
They inspire with ambitions and hopes of to-day
And show us the immortal ideal.

OHIO SPIRITUALISTS.

Eleventh Annual Convention of the State Association.

The Ohio State Spiritualist Association met in the state capital, Columbus, on May 29. The weather was favorable and the convention was a great success. Harmony and good will marked the proceedings throughout. On the 29th and 30th the business was conducted in the West Side Church, McDowell and State streets. On the evening of the 30th Dr. C. S. Carr, of Columbus, so widely and favorably known as a writer and speaker, gave the address of welcome to the delegates. The doctor's address was a masterpiece—truly unique—replete with figures of speech, expressing a warm welcome and offering words of cheer. Dr. C. S. Carr stands in the very front rank with the clear intellects of this century—a keen observer, a close and concise thinker, possessed of prophetic vision without the presumption too often associated with these qualities.

The well-lighted building was crowded in every corner, even standing room being at a premium. The address of welcome was certainly a rare treat, much enjoyed by the delegates and their friends from all parts of the state and its capital city. F. D. Dunakin, retiring president, ably responded. Short addresses were delivered by others including Mrs. Morrill, Grand Rapids, Mich., Mrs. Susanna Harris, of Columbus, and Mr. Dion, of Washington, followed with spirit messages. A young Hindu, a student, made a pointed and practical address.

On Sunday, May 31, the program was continued in the Masonic hall, 186 S. Third street. From this rostrum Miss Harlow, the able advocate of spiritual philosophy, has been addressing the people during the past year.

Increasing interest was manifested throughout the three meetings held on Sunday at 10 a. m., at 2 and 7:30 p. m. These meetings were addressed by Will J. Erwood, of Battle Creek, Mich., and William Strong, of Hamilton, Canada, also by D. A. Herrick, Ashtabula, Ohio. Other speakers who addressed varios meetings of the convention, were C. A. Sollinger, Cleveland; S. W. Mahaffey, Conneaut, Mrs. Schauss, Toledo, and Mary C. Ward. Message bearers not already named were Mrs. Wilson, Cleveland, Mrs. S. Herrick, Ashtabula.

The press of Columbus gave extensive reports of proceedings. These have greatly impressed the public.

There are a few changes in the official board of the Association. These, I understand, have already been given out to the press. H. E. Boerstler, of Columbus, is the newly elected president; Mrs. E. Schauss, first vice-president; Miss E. Harlow, second vice-president; C. A. Sollinger, Cleveland, secretary, and S. W. Mahaffey, treasurer. Under the leadership of these officers, the Ohio State Spiritual Association is expected to make great progress, supported as they are by wisely selected trustees. A motion was carried and a committee appointed to revise the constitution and by-laws of the Association.

Full meetings, crowding the hall at our convention, excellent addresses, coming with inspiring eloquence to the people, music discoursed by some of the best singers in the world, messages through our best mediums, proving without question the presence of our loved ones from the higher vibrations, contributions liberally given to sustain the good work—these all have come to encourage the workers in this great cause, to buckle on the armor for a better organization and more effective service in the field.

The needs of humanity are great and God and the angel world are preparing men and women for consecrated service. Spiritualism knows no state or national boundary. "The world is our country." Shall we unite in one army and work for the grand jubilee of the nations?

ANGELS.

Pilgrims, search the pages
Of the "Sacred Book" of old,
Gleau from its wondrous teachings
The story that's often told
Of Angels, grand, immortal,
Who sought to comfort and bless
Mortals treading the pathway
Of earth's tangled wilderness.

Angel's light footsteps wander
Through the "Holy Guide Book," rare,
Immortal voices whisper
In prophetic stories there.
Shadowy ones are thronging
The sacred covers between,
Pilgrims, be up and doing!
Peer beyond the mystic screen.

Far, in the shadowed silence
Of a dim, forgotten past,
An Angel gave redemption
To the sons of earth, who asked;
Wist ye not of the tempest,
That lashed to fury the sea?
An Angel's "Peace! Be quiet!"
Calmed the waters wild and free.

Do ye remember, pilgrims,
How the Angel wrenched away
The heavy prison fetters
Where one in darkness lay?
Wonderful are the tidings
From the mysterious shore,
That angels can unfasten
The beautiful, starry door,

And through the sun-kissed ether,
Can wander away to earth,
To drift their shining glory
Where of joy, there is a dearth.
Oh, pilgrims, can ye doubt it?
Can ye think it but a dream?
Enter ye into silence,
And behold the glory stream!

Pilgrims, traveling onward,
Over life's rugged highway,
When ye are faint, and weary,
And night follows rayless day;
Listen, for Angel whispers
Shall float from the golden shore,
And sheltered in their circle,
Your burdens shall crush no more.

Ye pilgrims, who may hearken
To an Angel at the door,
Give ear to what is spoken
Of a mystic, ancient lore.
Marvelous is the record;
Let those deride, who CAN,
The holy benediction,
Of an Angel, born of man.

Come Into My Parlor, Said the Spider to the Fly.

It is wondrous to note the revolution that has come over the religious world during the last few years. Formerly the determination was to crush all opposition. Heretics and disbelievers in the godhead of Jesus had no rights an orthodox churchman was bound to respect. Catholics and Protestants each warred on the other, and labored for the extinction of the opposing faith.

With inroads Spiritualism and Agnosticism have made on the churches a spirit of tolerance has sprung up among the former discordant sects; and, astonishing as it may seem, all at once Christians are proposing a friendly alliance with Jews.

Rev. Leighton Williams, D.D., of the "Christian Work and Evangelist," of New York, in a leading editorial, after noting the parallelisms between Jews and Christians, then inquires Jews and Christians, then inquires:

"Can we not, then, seek to unite on all questions of common concern; and interest such persons in the public-school system? * * * Instead of leaving out of the public-school curriculum every religious exercise to which objection is raised, * * * we seek to find in some fair and mutually satisfactory way * * * that on which we can all agree."

The object is declared to be to devise a method to introduce some religious instruction in the public schools including "the high ideals found in Biblical literature, biography, history, and ethics."

This movement is a repetition of the story of the spider and the fly. With the history of Christianity for the last 1,500 years, if the fly can be lured into the spider's net it deserves the fate sure to follow.

The teaching of Bible morality and ethics! Better reduce the clerical representation in the various penal institutions of this country before using methods to send up a new delegation.

A Staggered Hope.

Dr. Brown, of Rockford, Ill., addressing a lady friend of Boston, who had written him thusly:

"I am staggered when I think of the hereafter, as I look on the lifeless body and see it in decay. The creeds give but little trustful hope of another life."

To which the Doctor:

"Did you ever watch a great big black bug on the fence, and see it stupid, dead to appearance, then a slit from the head along the back opens gradually, when a whitish object within slowly crowds the slit open and crawls out? The wings begin to unfold and open, while gaudy colors rivaling the rainbow are put on? If so, my dear, doubting friend, you have seen a seventeen-year locust being born into the world, with golden-striped wings from an uncanny and loathsome object. When the locust is gone the pupa, a rude, black, corrugated shell only remains. The tenant has moved out.

"To me this picture often seen during a long life, makes the human cadaver seem only a vacated tenement, and the spirit which lately inhabited—invisible to mortal senses—has gone out to engage in nobler duties in new fields of delight.

"Be patient! The chrysalis condition of humanity will end, and the spirit will emerge, and join the loved of all the ages gone, with no more going out forever.

"Science furnishes evidence that change is the destiny of all life, but death is only a condition that paves the way to unending joy, and is merely a fiction of an untutored brain.

"Think this matter over, and over. It will develop into a great truth as you think, and give you, standing on the verge of life, a world of pleasure.

"It is not a thought born of creeds, but a great truth inherent in nature, which I as earnestly believe as any things I know."

In Truth It Was "Thus Saith the PRIEST."

The Holy Scriptures, inspired by God, gives a "Thus saith the Lord," for every act or law of Moses or Joshua. Thousands on thousands of persons were slaughtered, and their belongings were carried away in obedience to a "Thus saith the Lord." Preachers for ages have been thundering from their pulpits:

"Reason has nothing to do with our religious faith. Our creeds and the entire system derive their force from commands of God, and until abrogated by him must be observed."

And so reason is silenced, and all the horrible teachings of the church, in regard to after-death punishment continues to be taught as a divine truth.

Kenrick, in his great work entitled, "Ancient Egypt under the Pharoahs, Alden's edition, page 380, says:

"The Egyptian priesthood retained in their own hands that powerful instrument for governing the minds of men, the power of predicting, or GIVING COMMANDS IN THE NAME OF THE DIVINITY."

Kenrick then goes on to say:

"In other countries this power was hereditary in families, or was supposed to be possessed by individuals, who, by superior sanctity, had been admitted to the knowledge of the divine mind, or by mystic rites and invocations had obtained it from superhuman sources."

He then relates the prevalence of the custom among the Greeks, and many other nations, and cites Bible authority for the practice of the custom among the Jews. And yet all the Munchausens related in the Bible as conversations Moses held with the "Lord," the passing of stone tablets on which God inscribed the ten commandments, down through a rift in the cloud to Moses, which became the law to all nations, for all time, are earnestly believed and taught by the Christian church. Why, they are so simple as to believe he who created the mighty universe with its millions of suns and innumerable planets, was employed forty days in preparing those tablets with his own fingers, while idle Moses was probably looking on, watching the process.

The probabilities are, Moses and Aaron, and the whole family of patriarchs in Bible stories are fictions. There is no corroborating history, aside from Josephus, and many scholars who have investigated know he is a comparatively modern fiction, compiled by monks, for the sole purpose of having something to harmonize with the Old Testament.

Doubling Up.

When danger is nigh an army concentrates all its forces at a strategic point, that it may the more successfully defend itself from a sudden attack of the enemy, or become itself the aggressor. It has been apparent for a long time that the churches were sniffing danger from afar, and were reefing their sails to be ready for the oncoming storm. Prof. Wenley, of the University of Michigan, sounded the key-note when he said: "We [the churches] shall stand aghast and helpless," when criticism clarifies the evidence on which Christianity is founded. Preparatory to it, the General Assembly of the Presbyterian church of the United States, recently in session at Kansas City, Mo., has adopted a resolution approving the plan of a federal council of Churches of Christ in America, which is composed of twenty-seven of the leading Protestant and evangelical churches in the country, with the hope that the first meeting of the federal council will result in plans of co-operation which will manifest more clearly unity in Jesus Christ of churches and advance in a noteworthy manner the interests of the kingdom of Christ in the United States and throughout the world.

When Louis Philippe, king of France, who had fallen into disfavor, tendered his resignation Aug. 2, 1830, in favor of his grandson, the duke of Bordeaux, to the assembled thousands, the cry, "It is too late," "It is too late," swelled into a maddening chorus. Abdication without qualification became a necessity. And so the churches. It is too late to centralize; it is too late to form new combinations, hoping thereby to regain strength and perpetuity. The system has been weighed in the balance, and is found defective. Whether standing alone, or united with others, founded on force, fraud and forgery, it must go down with advancing intelligence, aided by the spirit influences on the other side of life.

To Be Better Compensated.

The General Assembly of the Presbyterians, late in session at Kansas City, favored giving every minister a thousand dollars a years. Cheap enough. Commissioned, according to Bishop Grafton, of Fond du Lac, "to teach, not what they think is true, but what the church puts into their mouths to teach," being merely salaried pettifoggers, they ought to be generously compensated. A person who labors to promulgate his own belief can well afford to be content with a smaller reward. He who is skilled in making the worse appear the better argument, and labors to make the world better by threatening sinners with everlasting damnation, adding a bribe as a chorister, with a seat at the right hand of God to sing his praises forever, richly merits a fair reward. Ingersoll probably robbed $25,000 a year for kicking hell into oblivion, and it was worth it

A Hundred Versus One.

A Southern brother complains, thinking Mr. Carrington's narrative of experience at Lily Dale will "injure" Spiritualism. His experience there is only a very little episode in connection with our Cause, and will in NO WISE INJURE IT, but in the end will be instrumental in doing good.

We are publishing continuously ONE HUNDRED cases of remarkable spirit manifestations, to ONE where fraud is apparent, and who so blind they can not see that fact?

Who so behind the times they can not observe the trend of our Cause upward and onward? Read The Progressive Thinker each week and see from time to time the VAST ARRAY of evidence in behalf of Spirit Return. We are now furnishing our readers, from time to time, translations from the French by that highly cultured lady, Mrs. A. Monthon Tattersfield, illustrating the trend of Spirit Return in France.

Our Southern friend should read The Progressive Thinker more carefully, and then he will not be in the least alarmed, for the genuine and the fraud stand forth a HUNDRED VS. ONE. When you bring the genuine and fraud together, in the above proportion, you have the result, a MAGNIFICENT SHOWING INDEED.

Then again another brother entertains the idea that Mrs. Pemberton should be defended against the opinion of Hereward Carrington. We have published in the past column after column, alleging the genuineness of Mrs. Pemberton, and THEY STILL STAND IN HER FAVOR, and why go over that same ground again? Each seance must stand on its own merits, and whatever YOU have experienced with Mrs. Pemberton in years past can not be used to refute the experiences of Mr. Carrington.

When Winans was exposed at Hot Springs, Ark., and a bushel of his paraphernalia captured, which was used to present bogus spirits, then—whew! from various remote corners came articles saying, "I had experience with Winans, and he is a genuine medium!" Verily, what next? We did not publish those communications, and why? The evidence presented was worthless as showing his innocence at Hot Springs. His paraphernalia to dress bogus spirits was in Chicago, and however "pure and honest" he may have been in the past, that had nothing whatever to do with his methods at Hot Springs.

Then again not one of the mediums at Lily Dale—they or their guides—discovered that Mr. Carrington had innocently assumed a name. Alas! what an opportunity to knock the gentleman out, by giving his true name! Reader, reflect on this point! Had he been in Chicago, we could have referred him to several mediums who would have given his real name at once. He could not have deceived them. Particularly Mrs. Weaver, of 46 De Kalb street, would have discovered the innocent deception at once. Alas! Why was this golden opportunity at Lily Dale to do a grand work for the Cause, so sadly neglected?

Changing Sides.

Nineteen Protestant pastors gone or going over to Catholics was the report last week. "If there be a highway to Rome there is certainly a good, broad trail back again," says "The Gospel Messenger." Regret is expressed by Gesner, a correspondent, that he has not preserved each year the number who have left Rome "for a purer and more primitive faith." He says in 1890 "The English Church Review" gave the names of twenty-one who had formerly been priests of the church of Rome. In 1895-6 the Church of England received eight, and in 1897 twenty-one. Other numbers are mentioned which seem to indicate there is a continual priestly sliding from the mother church to Protestahtism, and the reverse.

Our regret is that we cannot determine the slump from all Christian denominations, either into Spiritualism or Agnosticism. Certain it is, the numbers are greatly in excess of those enumerated by either party in the present contest as going from one church to another. Usually the voluntarily retired clergymen from any of the many churches engage in some species of commercialism. They seem to covet obscurity, with a change of faith.

A Bloodless Political Platform.

The Progressive Thinker has no desire or intention to mingle in the political contest soon to open in this great country of ours, but we own to real delight, when we read recently the account of an an interviewer who had just visited Governor Johnson, of Minnesota, a possible candidate for the Presidency, who declared:

"I consider the ruthless sacrifice of any form of animal life needlessly cruel. I should not gain pleasure putting a shot into a doe, and then watch her look at me with frightened, mournful eyes, as she gasps out her last breath."

Would to heaven all candidates for office, and all suffragists everywhere occupied the same correct position. The age of war, of bloodshed and violence would soon end, and one of peace, prosperity and happiness would follow and culminate in joyous fruition.

Simplicity forms a main ingredient in a noble nature.—Thucydides.

Most Marvelous Manifestations

A Message Written On the Hand by Spirits.—A Lamentable Premature Death and Interment.

To the Editor: I herewith submit for your columns a record of one of the most wonderful tests of spirit return. Especially is it wonderful because the phenomena mentioned in the spirit message was known and witnessed by the living, thus establishing without controversy certain conditions which obtained after death and interment.

In earth-life the subject had been a woman of strong character, of more than usual intellectuality, a school teacher before marriage, then a faithful and devoted wife, and mother of three children.

When the civil war was declared, her husband responded to the first call for volunteers; he was in Pittsburg Landing. He survived with the few left after the fight was ended. He served his country through the whole five years, with fidelity and honor. After being mustered out of service, he was placed in charge of a freedman's camp of 250 men, women and children, on a plantation near Pine Bluff, Ark. He sent North for his family. After he was relieved of government work, he took up his residence in town and became a citizen of the state, was elected senator, and with others drafted the new constitution at Little Rock. The health of his wife was enfeebled by the malarial influences of that climate, but she chose to remain and not have the family again broken up and separated.

At this time, 1867, in the summer, I was about seventy miles from my brother home, the only medium of communication by mail once a week, and transportation by steamboat on the Arkansas river. One day while sojourning there, I received a letter in my brother's handwriting with the envelope bordered in black, which contained the sad news of the death and burial of his wife and babe. Fully intending to bring the remains North for final interment, they were placed in a metallic casket, and a temporary grave made in the grounds immediately under his bed-room window.

After a few months he decided he would make his home in the South, purchased a lot in the cemetery, and engaged a sexton to raise the casket and transfer it to his lot. Personally directing the change to be made, when the casket had been raised, he asked the sexton to remove the part of the coffin-lid over the face. It would be almost an impossibility to realize the awful shock he received when he saw the flesh on the face of his dead wife torn by the finger-nails and covered with blood, and both of her hands full of hair torn from her head. Then he realized that she had been buried alive, that the babe of only five months' development had shared her fate. The attending physician had certified to her death. Relying on his skill, he had accepted his decision as final, although the symptoms in the case were peculiar. The circulation of the blood had been sluggish for some time. The action of the heart grew more feeble until it seemed to have ceased altogether. The extremities became cold, but there was no "rigor mortis," or premonitory signs of decomposition.

On the evening of May 12, 1908, four persons were seated around a table in a dark circle, one of the four being a psychometrist; the tips of the fingers on the right hand of each resting lightly upon the left hand of the person adjoining. Not one of the eight hands could be moved without breaking the condition, which proved to be highly favorable.

During twenty or thirty minutes three of the members of the circle were conscious of the touch of at least a dozen of their spirit friends and relatives, each one showing their light and giving their name to the psychometrist in passing. I was lightly tapped upon the forehead. When I told this to him he responded quickly, "Two in one grave, Doctor." For a moment I could not recall any such circumstance in our family history, as it had been forty years since my brother's wife was buried. The spirit then gave her first name, which I immediately recognized.

After light was restored messages were received, written and read after an examination of each right hand through a powerful magnifying glass. Each message was written from right to left, the peculiar script resembling the Arabic upon comparison. Here follows the message as it was delivered to me:

"Dear Sister: I am very glad that I have been able to reach you after such a long time of waiting. When in my coffin I became conscious that I had been buried, was past all help from the living, and realized that my offspring had shared my fate. The mental and physical agony I suffered was so intense that I scratched my face until it was covered with blood, and tore from my head both handsfull of hair in my death struggles. After our spirits were freed from their clay tenement, and passed to their future home in the summerland, I was glad it was all over; no more pain, or suffering—only happiness forevermore. I have come to communicate the fact to you as a doctor, that since the practice of piercing the heart by the undertaker has obtained, many spirits have come among us whose cases were those of suspended animation like mine, or else a cataleptic condition, who were ushered out of existence by this cruel practice among the undertakers. I shall depend upon your help, that you will bear this testimony of mine and others in the spirit world, to as many of the dwellers on your earth plane as you can possibly reach, by voice and pen, and exhort others also to use their influence and power to stop this mutilation of the human body until signs of death are present, even if legislation becomes necessary. The consciousness of being buried alive is awful in the extreme; for every one should have the right to live out the time allotted to them on earth. In all peculiar cases of so-called death, the body should be permitted to remain without mutilation by the undertaker until there is not the shadow of doubt that REAL death has taken place. I am often with you in spirit, giving you all the help and comfort I can, and know I shall receive your help in carrying out my wishes on this vital subject."

Any one reading this communication will now recall this statement, made at first, viz.: That the phenomena mentioned in the spirit message was witnessed by two living persons, the husband and the sexton, which establishes the test, and confirms the truthfulness of the spirit message beyond the shadow of a doubt.

June 1, as an addenda to this article, permit me to submit this later development of spirit return, which was manifested through the mediumship of Mrs. Brockway, Sunday night, May 31, at Vincennes hall. A friend who is a trained nurse of more than ordinary ability was present, a country woman and personal acquaintance of our beloved and lamented physician, Dr. Christian Fenger, one of the finest pathologists Chicago ever had, whose lectures to the students at the County Hospital morgue were always a pleasure, marred only by his inability to speak English fluently. His spirit manifested a desire to communicate with Hans Christiansen. When this name was called it was found that two persons were in the audience bearing that name; the one whose sister was now ill, who had been a patient in earth life, was then designated, and directions given to him that one hour each day should be observed by concentrating all thought upon Dr. Fenger and two other physicians whose names were given, who would assist him in the treatment until his sister recovered her health." This the nurse considered a wonderful test of spirit return, and was only one of many that were given on that occasion.

After reading the first article to her which I had just finished, she told me how horrified she was when she came to Chicago eleven years ago to find that the practice of burying persons in twenty-four to forty-eight hours after death obtained here. In Denmark no body was buried for nine days after death. As soon as death seemed present the body was washed, a white robe put on and laid upon a board in the parlor or bed-room of the home for three days; then it was shrouded, coffined, and placed upon a catafalque in the chapel where the windows were open day and night, the coffin open and constantly watchers were in attendance from the time death supervened until the nine days had elapsed, during which time she said she knew of many cases which had entirely recovered.

This is another positive proof of my sister's spirit message, viz.: That many spirits had come among them who might still be living here, but for the piercing of the heart soon after they ceased to breathe.

A TRENCHANT COMMUNICATION.

Something More on "Commercial Mediumship," in Which the Writer Makes Some Excellent Points.

To the Editor: Perhaps I have had my full quota of time and space in your valuable columns on this important subject, and when my last article was written, it was sent with my silent resolve to let the subject rest as far as my voice and pen were concerned. But the subject "will not down." So much has been said and written to me concerning it, that I feel a litle more is to be said from my standpoint, in justice to our honest and genuine mediums, some of whom are too timid to speak for themselves.

Several prominent and valuable workers in our ranks have told me that they were glad I was the medium to have written the former article, because it had been a burning question in their own work, and they had suffered from the attitude taken by some of the noted officers in society work on what the latter are pleased to call "commercial mediumship." They, the mediums, say that their legitimate work had been interfered with, for while their spirit guides do nothing in the line that our state officers define as fortune telling, and while they, themselves do not advertise in any secular paper, yet by the commendation or statements of workers in the Spiritualists ranks, they have been avoided by outside investigators and others who need spiritual counsel and help.

Of course the work and the usefulness of such mediums are cramped in this way, and it is true that, as they assert, the enemies of Spiritualism may after all be in our own ranks, and not found so much in the outside world. This is why these workers are glad the question arose in as prominent a paper as The Progressive Thinker, and that I happened to be the one to take the medium's side, because they felt I am one of them and can understand. Of course, none of those mediums I have mentioned or referred to would condone fraud, nor is any of them a trickster, or in any sense trading on the fine senses of any person, spirit or mortal. They are honest mediums, and some of them are so prominent in the important work of our Cause, that the public would be highly interested if their names were printed.

The question of material blessings, and benefits will come up in circles and the sittings of mediums; it is bound to. If poor human beings are harassed by the cares and perplexities, the agonies and miseries of grinding conditions, how can they be happy and satisfied with life? And if they have any faith in spirit help, to whom would they naturally turn for advice and light than to a reputed medium? This very matter came up for consideration at one of the board meetings of the N. S. A. when I was secretary; not the first time the subject had received our attention at such meetings. I expressed myself then as I do now, and most of my valued associates on the board took the same ground. Said one of our honored trustees: "I want to say now, that if I should pass away, and as a spirit, I saw my wife was in need of counsel and guidance on her affairs I would most certainly want her to visit Mrs. ———, naming a medium present."

Now, Mr. Editor, the element of business would enter very largely in a sitting for such a case, and so it does in nine-tenths of the sittings of mediums, because you can not disassociate the mortal affairs and interests of a human being on earth from his spiritual concerns, and deal with the latter only. I am not appealing for an individual case but for a matter of principle, and in justice to our mediums whose honest and useful work have been the means of building up SPIRITUALISM. WITHOUT OUR MEDIUMS THERE WOULD BE NO SPIRITUALISM, and I submit that it is not JUST to so harass and handicap them and their guides as to practically drive them from the field of their usefulness, a field that, with all due respect to the members of those professions, is as legitimate and beneficial as those of the lawyer and the doctor. Lawyers do not always win the suits for their clients. Physicians do not cure every patient they handle. The world has a large graveyard of buried hopes in the form of defeated cases of law, not to speak of cemeteries where the mistakes of doctors rest; why, then, should mediums be ostracized for a calling to which they are impelled by good, spiritual guidance to turn?

WE ARE NOT DEFENDING FRAUDS NOR APOLOGIZING FOR THE WORK OF MEDIUMS; we are dealing with MEDIUMSHIP and its legitimate uses, and we ask no favor. I know of a case where a young girl was saved from suicide by a material message from a spirit. I know of another where a young man was saved from prison, or rather from committing a felony, by a spirit through a so-called "commercial medium." Another case in point: A gentleman who had a fairly good paying ranch came to consult the spirits, first, to get all that he could in consoling messages, and incidentally to ask the spirits to see what they could do for his wife who had been pronounced incurable by the doctors, and she was cured by spirit advice, too, which also comes in the category of material or mundane interests. During that sitting the spirits warned the man not to sell his place and take a store in the city. Some time elapsed, and he came again, in great trouble; he had disregarded the advice, had sold out in the country and purchased the city store, only to become so tangled in obligations and debt that he knew not which way to turn. This man fairly pleaded for a sitting and after much urging, the medium responded with the result that a spirit with keen, clear insight of the case and lawyer-like counsel, gave the man such good advice and honest information that he was set on the road to an untangle-ment of his difficulties. HE was a good man, had been the prey of a sharper, and I do not believe that the spirits committed any wrong by showing him a way out of his trouble. This is all I have to say.

I STAND FOR HONEST MEDIUMSHIP; IT IS THE BULWARK OF SPIRITUALISM.

COMMERCIAL MEDIUMSHIP.

Rev. G. C. Love, a Prominent Lecturer and Medium of Oregon, Presents His Views.—He Has Tried Doing Free Work in Mediumship, and Knows Whereof He Writes.—Lost $2,000.

To the Editor: In your valuable paper of May 9, 1908, I find the views of two of our highly esteemed coworkers in the cause of Spiritualism regarding the long and loudly discussed question of commercial mediumship, or in other words, Is it right for mediums to charge for readings and give advice on affairs pertaining to this present life?

"The laborer is worthy of his hire." This declaration holds good, it seems, in all things but mediumship (in the estimation of some people) and just why mediumship is "hammered" so much by these people I am unable to explain.

If the state of Missouri has made ample provision through its State Association for the mediums within its borders, they should not charge for the readings to private individuals.

If they do not eat, live in their own houses, paying no taxes, and dress like Mother Eve, they do not need money, and should give their time and talents free of charge.

I found that as a medium, I had to at all times keep myself clothed in a presentable manner for all who came to me for readings.

I also faced the fact that I had to support myself and family by my labor in the various walks of life, or make my mediumship support me and my family.

I tried mediumship without making any charge to any who might call for the period of two years, and at the end of that time I found that not one penny had been left in my hands by any of the hundreds of the anxious, troubled souls whom I had served, and that nearly $2,000 had gone from what I had put away for "the rainy day," although my time was all taken up by these visitors whom I was serving and many of them well fixed financially. I gave lectures and public message work in societies, receiving the same kind of pay I received from my sitters in private.

I awakened to the fact that Spiritualists WOULD LET ME STARVE if I continued the work, making no charge, and if I again went into manual labor, I could not leave that labor at the beck and call of each one who came for readings.

The public would not pay me for time and readings given to private individuals, for the public was not interested in or benefited by those private readings. The ones who came for the private readings declared it was none of the public's business, and the reading must be private. Who then was going to pay me for my mediumship so I could be ready to serve those calling on me for readings? Surely not the public, for the public did not get the readings—HAD NO INTEREST IN THE READINGS.

The only logical answer to the question, "Who shall pay for the readings?" then was, the party getting the reading and taking up my time was the party benefited and should pay for it. "Freely they had received; freely they should give" (pay for my services).

I want to think that State Association of Missouri want their mediums to have proper support for the good work they are doing in proving that the assertions of the lecturer are true. I want to think the president of that State Association want their mediums cared for in a way that would make it unnecessary for them to charge for readings. If the president and State Association has provided for them, they should work for nothing.

Here is one vital question regarding the matter under discussion: Who is of the most importance to Spiritualism? The one who preaches its doctrine or the one who proves the doctrine true? Put it like this: Is the lecturer or the medium of the most importance to the cause?

The answer always comes back (except from the lecturer) THE MEDIUM; yet the lecturer must be paid, the medium must not charge.

The lecturer tells the society calling him, "I must have my carfare, my entertainment and room rent free and a certain price for lecture, as I have to have something for clothing, laundry and my family.

The mediums must not charge for they can either walk or fly; they need no clothing and their family can go to ——, if they cannot stay and make their own way in the world.

Wipe out mediumship, past, present and future, and in a few years our lecturers would be busy chopping wood, mauling rails, planting potatoes or "any other old thing" they could get to do for their living.

Think of a lecturer giving a fine talk of unending life and spirit communion and then calling on a medium to prove his lecture true; then hear that lecturer declare the medium must not charge.

Think of keeping that medium ever in readiness to meet any and all that may consult her, no matter how pressing the medium's affairs, yet the medium must not charge, while the lecturer usually has classes and charges for each one in each class.

What more right has the lecturer to fees, than has the medium? It is the medium that gives the consolation, banishes the gloom and proves to the sorrowing seeker for truth, that just beyond the shadow the loved ones are in the real life to commune with his or her friends in the flesh, yet that medium's time must be given for naught, whether she has the time to spare or not, and must not even take heed for food or clothing.

I have no malice in penning these lines in justice to mediums. I have the highest esteem for my good brother, Paul McArthur, but certainly feel he is wrong in his idea that mediums should do their work free of charge, unless they are provided for by some society, or find themselves sufficiently able to give their time and readings without charge.

A Voice From the Happy Hunting Grounds

Spirituality of the Indians.—The Original God.—Occultism, Spirit Return and Immortality Taught in the Rude Temples of the Pawnees.—The White Man's Sin and Salvation Scheme Ignored.—An Epistle to the Modern Babylonians, by Harry E. Burgess.

Having "prophesied" on several occasions recently to assemblies of the faithful, I now take the opportunity of addressing the larger gathering of readers of The Progressive Thinker, to place before you the "Indian" and his Father Above, and his lesser gods. First, I wish to state that no truer picture of the native North American has ever been rendered, in so few words, and so suggestively beautiful, than the immortal apostrophe by Alexander Pope:

"Lo, the poor Indian, whose untutored mind Sees God in clouds, and hears him in the wind."

As much as this statement of the savage sentiment has been ridiculed and attacked, still anyone who knows the Indian can vouch for the fact that it truly represents his mind.

Ages before the valiant Columbus landed upon our island shores, these native peoples (Indian tribes) were carrying out their religious rites, the same as many of them are doing to this day. When the writer was a little boy his home was among the Pawnee Indians—his parents having been sent to Nebraska under the auspices of the Society of Friends, to take charge for the government of the four bands of the Pawnees. It was an every-day occurrence to hear chiefs and "medicine men" (priests) addressing the power above as Father (A-ti-us). Everyone knows how it is customary for these people to assemble and talk. Hence at such times the talk of spiritual forces that rule the universe and all life, was commonly interspersed with all subject matter. When thunder sounded throughout the heavens they would remark, "They are at council!" and cedar branches would be placed upon the coals, that the incense might rise to "the gods" or rulers above.

The belief in spirits is not a theory with the Indian. It is a part of his life and experience. Warriors lost in battle return and hold converse with their relatives, and predict battles and even help through the agency of the winds and storms. The animal creation is an important part of the Divine economy in the Indian's estimation. The animals give messages to their human brothers; and on the battle fields, in the darkness of the night, the animals come to succor the wounded, and have brought many back to life, or resurrection, rather, for these are departed souls that return. They bring the message that their dismembered parts were put together by the animals, and that they are in complete form in the new life. Certain noted Indians claim to have died temporarily, and to have had a view of the "Beyond." Not being welcomed by their departed friends, they returned to life, to finish out its natural course. This manner of telling their experiences regarding things spiritual is an important feature of the Indian's life here upon earth. It never occurs to him that there is anything strange about such demonstrations, as he regard it as the natural detail of God's great affairs.

The Indian is naturally religious, truly religious. He knows no doubt of the Creator, nor does he criticise the divine plans. Again the great poet above referred to expresses the Indian's trust:

"Whatever is, is right!"

When you go to these people with your "book religion" and your written plan of salvation, and the theory of original sin, you have a hard customer to deal with, especially in trying to force it down his savage throat. In the first place he questions your authority to deliver him such a message, and he resents your high-handed manner of ignoring his own faith in and understanding of the Omnipotent. The veteran savage warrior has thought a great deal along the lines of divinity and the future state, all through the ages. The Pawnee regards his people as the favored of the one above. He is not ready to acknowledge the superiority of another people.

It should be borne in mind that the Indian is original; that he has certain priority rights. He owes no allegiance to the white race for his mental development, and is under no obligations to any other people for his existence or his religion. He does not molest others in regard to their faith or their theories of life and death and the Hereafter. Any and all protest that he may make is in defense. He never has tolerated the attempted ruthless annihilation of his simple trust in Omnipotent Spirit. To him this Eternal Principle pervades all nature—is Intelligence deified, is resident in and beyond the clouds, and manifests its voice in the winds and in the thunder. Its force is demonstrated in all physical phenomena, most especially in the heavenly bodies. To deny this Supreme Power would to the Indian indicate insanity or depravity.

The Pawnee has no profanity in his language. He has to acquire this art from his white brother. As he hears more of it, on the borders of civilization than any other speech, and as he knows it is the verbiage of the missionaries turned to sacrilegious use, he asks himself: "To what extremes of evil dare this white race go?" To his simple understanding—which simplicity is only a form of truth—the white man dares all things; invades the province of the Supreme Ruler to promote his commerce, and alternately worships and blasphemes the Divinity of his ancient book.

After the testimony of the religion of civilization is all put before him—via the missionary route—the Indian's mind is thrown into temporary chaos, and he reasons thus: "And you tell me that all this I too, must do, and must believe—in order that I may be saved! Indeed! And why should this message come to me at this late day, and in this particular way. Wherefore, if this be true, hath not the gods of my fathers—the Father of Life—the Spirit Omnipotent (Tilau-wa-hut) manifested this unto me direct? Truly this strange race surpasses us in cunning and in gaining its ends, to my detriment, if not total destruction. This strange god truly hath given power unto his people whereby they succeed even in conquering the original races. But it is not for me. Pass on, thou apostle! I understand thee not. My mind reels." Then to his attendant: "Quickly, the sacred pipe! Let the Powers Above not behold me wavering." And he sends puffs upward, earthward, and in the four directions, to the gods that support the universe and the utters the following:

"Father Above! Just as thou wilt. Even so let it be! Ye gods (Powers) that rule, behold me miserable! Be ever with me and guide me. Father, look down upon thine own people, and let them prosper. We would not wander from thine appointed way!"

The Indian is the least known, least appreciated and least studied of ancient peoples. That he represents an ancient people will be a surprising fact, no doubt, to many readers. It is this very ancient quality that should entitle him to our most intelligent concern, inasmuch as all our "divine" records, our gods, demons, saviors, saints and what-not were launched forth in the dark and dubious East, when humanity was groping in simian tentativeness and fear. The native North American is a proud being; proud of his ancestry, and an adept in things psychic and spiritual. The ethical principles of Christianity appeal to him, and conform with his own knowledge of right and happiness. It is the dogmatism of the "superior" race, and dictation in spiritual things that choke him and render him obdurate, and hold him in a state of "barbarism."

The white man's religion, with its miracles, tyranny, doctrine of sin, and scheme of salvation; the church, with its high-handed bossism, theory of original depravity, and power of damnation, and assumed authority in everything, even to its opposition toward general enlightenment as well as the arbitrariness of its "divine" injunctions, all strikes the Indian as a well-laid plan to confuse, and overpower him, and he says, "No! I am what I am—what the Divine Ruler made me. Originally I was free and happy, and roamed the earth upon which I was placed, and was smiled upon by the gods and the Great One above. Now comes the invader! He not only robs me of everything tangible, assumes possession of God's earth, spurns me as of some lesser order of the creation, and immediately proceeds to violate and pollute the sanctuaries of my people, and would deprive us of our faithh and dependence in and upon our own Deity."

There was a certain Pawnee warrior chief, who after attaining distinction for generosity among the people and courage and leadership in war, was killed in battle by the native enemy. This personage was known as Pa-hu-kaut-tau-a. Since his departure to the Hereafter, this chief has returned to his people, has been seen by them, and has held conversation with his relatives. He has predicted battles by spirit agency, and has even officiated in spirit form in the thick of battle, and has kept his own spirit prophecies—that he would turn the storms of the heavens against their enemy and have them destroyed. These things have actually occurred, and are attributed by intelligent Indians to the spirit power and influence of this same Pau-hu-kaut-tau-a.

The Pawnee locates the mind and soul in the breast. In his reckoning, the brain is merely a portion of the physical system. Hence where it is ordinarily said, I think, the Indian invariably says, "I feel," and he is wont to place his hand over his breast when asserting his convictions. The Pawnee is by nature a warrior—a veritable Bedouin of the prairie. He glorified war. God helped him in his warring against a confederated enemy. Every tribe on the plains, from the Upper Missouri to the Rio Grande (including the Mexicans) have been his enemy. Through the ages he has withstood this combined force. Every eastward-flowing river between the Rocky mountains and the Missouri shows ruins of the permanent towns of this remarkable people. While using the regular teepe in his migrations, as upon the buffalo hunt, twice a year, still he ever maintained a permanent abode in the earth lodges and villages.

Some of these rude temples were fifty feet in diamter. They were covered heavily with earth, and would hold hundreds of people on the top. In times of alarm by the enemy it was a common sight to see them covered black with people. There being no near-by hills, these dwellings formed the only points of elevation from which to gain a view of what might be approaching on the distant plain. Every one of these lodges faced the east; and opposite the entrance, where the rays of the rising sun might fall upon it, was a rude altar, upon which was placed the painted skull of a buffalo, and over this hung the sacred bundle—a sort of ark of covenant between the savage and his God. The atmosphere of mystery, sacredness, divinity, pervaded all the lodges of the principal leaders, especially those of the chiefs and high priests—mystery workers, generall denominated "medicine men," by the whites.

The Pawnees claim that their corn seed was handed down to them at the creation. This form of food, with the meat of the buffalo, was their staff of life. The attribute of Motherhood was given to the corn. The same was done to the earth. The corn reproduced itself, and the earth sustained all—themselves, the corn and the buffalo. Portions of the first buffalo killed on the periodical hunts or marches were sacrificed as a burnt offering to the Overruling Gods. The Supreme Father looked down upon all and was pleased. Everything touching the buffalo and the corn had to be done in a certain prescribed way. For this subsistence the people must bless the Great Spirit in many ways and with great solemnity and frequently.

When the great Man Chief of the Pawnees, the acknowledged Caesar of the Indian people, lay sick with a gunshot wound in the leg, he was visited by the agent's son (now president of the Chicago Spiritualists' League), the noble savage turned to the white youth and said: "My son, I am to go hence! My life now ends here on earth. The voice in the sky (thunder) announced to me that I now am to take my journey into the other life." He died suddenly, although it had not ben expected, for the wound was not considered to be fatal.

The writer once heard an eminent leader of the Pawnees say to another, "Well, what of it all? I am a spirit, anyway." Again the most famous war chief of these people bore the name of "Chief of the Gods." Another prominent man's name was "Spirit Horse." There is still living at Pawnee, Oklahoma, an old Pawnee by the name of "Guarded by the Overruling Spirits." So many occurrences of spirits returning to prophesy to their people have caused many to believe that they are warriors who had been scalped in battle, and who exist in a sort of half-way state between earth and the hereafter. Little children were told to beware of these phantom people, lest they be carried away. The scalped people live in caves, and are supported and sympathized with by the animals, as intermediary messengers of the gods. At certain caves in Nebraska and Kansas, these animals gather and hold sacred ceremonies.

The red stone pipe may called the Indian's Bible. He prays over it at every lighting and smoking. Leaders of war parties are guided by the benign influence of the sacred pipe. It is claimed that it lights itself, and will indicate direction, somewhat as a compass. This is plainly but the interpretation of the spiritual impression received by the possessor. With the Pawnee, in his native state, all was with and of God. Man without God and the gods was inconceivable. As well say the skies without the sun, or a child without a mother. To sum up the religion of the Indian, as exemplified through the Pawnee, it was a rude and natural form of spiritual belief, and an ever-abiding trust and dependence in a Father of Life, and the attributing of sacredness to all the visible creation; to regard so-called death as but change of existence, and the continuation of life as a simple fact.

In the writer's humble opinion, it would be better for the arrogant and gold-loving white man if he were to see a little more of God in clouds and hear him occasionally in the wind. Let it be said in conclusion, that whenever an Indian forsakes his natural religion, he is no longer an Indian, and furthermore he has either been coerced, hypnotized by fear of eternal damnation, or else he was crazy. Lastly, let nothing be added to or taken from this document under penalty of the wrath of the Almighty Ruler, or of the Incas, or of the Pawnees, or of all the warring hosts that peopled this half of the created world during the thousands of ages before the Castilian queen's divinely inspired ambassador kissed the shores of San Salvador, or Cortez and Pizzaro scourged and slaughtered the inhabitants, all for their salvation, and incidentally to appropriate their possessions.

Shade of Montezuma! May this pen be tempered in giving the Indian's indictment of the tyranny and oppression symbolized to him by the white man's sacred cross. The spirit of Sitting Bull proclaims his eternal refutation of the creeds and dogmas of his conquerors! His voice still thunders through the Paha Sapa (Black Hills), blending with the thunders of Wakon-tonka: "I want not your God on paper nor your story of the gift from your heaven to a foreign people in the ages gone! I am what God made. All I ask is to be let alone. Like the animals I seek my subsistence as I roam the earth. The God of the Dakotas beholds me in my misery. I am satisfied. The caverns and out-of-the-way places are all that is left me as a home. Now you would take this from me. I have but to die now, and join the warriors gone before in the better world. This doctrine you advocate so strongly is not for me or mine. We now dance and celebrate the return of the spirits (Ghost Dance). This is to us as much as your sacred ways are to you. The spirits of the departed warriors are with us. They are our only hope. By fasting and paying attention to God we shall be restored again, and these spirits are here to help us. Take me, starve me, torture me, kill me, if you will, but as Wa-kon-ton-ka sees and hears me, I remain now and always—Ta-tonk-ap-tonka (Sitting Bull). La-ko-ta am I! I trust to God! Say to your government, I say NO! That I have ever spoken with but one voice, in the straight way. Let our soldiers come, or bribe my own good people to capture me. Here on this spot (Grand River), my childhood's home, I die!"

He was ordered to be taken to Standing Rock Agency "dead or alive." Indians from that agency (under McLaughlin) were employed to capture the veteran warrior. As he fell, mortally wounded, he shot his captor—Bull Head. No living being can point to a single act of injury ever done toward a white man by Sitting Bull. In his unwarrantable assassination, under department orders, there fell a truly savage Napoleon. He was above the petty graft and favor-seeking of other Indian leaders. He died a martyr to his own intuitive, savage principles of right and justice. Long ago he had predicted the doom of his people at the hands of the white man, through the connivance of political workers among his own race. He chose to die; denounced with his last breath the falsity and perfidy of the so-called superior race, and its tyrannical dogmas of sin, salvation, divine law. This same Indian chief should be given credit for the greatest spiritual demonstration, with the most tragic consequences, ever known in history—the Ghost Dance—only a crude name for a religio-spiritual festival in which the departed were the chief factors.

No! The Indian refuses to accept the doctrine of the church, that all knowledge of God originates and emanates from the Babylonian region. He denies that the only guide to life is in a written book. He sees in it all only oppression and destruction. It does not set well upon his simple, strong reasoning to imply that the Omnipotent Creator made a mistake in making him different, and by placing him upon the Missouri instead of the Euphrates. What he sees in his clouds and hears in his winds is more potent than the story told him by foreigners, who, with their sacred symbol held before him, threaten him with damnation hereafter, and straightforward proceed to despoil him of everything that constitutes his home. There is no God in this for Poor Lo!

A Christian preacher was telling the Indians upon a certain august occasion that they must not do wrong, like lying, stealing, killing, etc.; that if they did they would not get to heaven, but would be burned in everlasting fire. The Indian was rejoiced, and explained that, after hearing that, now he knew that in the next life the Indians would not be bothered with any white people, for they surely all would be burned, as all that he had seen or heard of the whites, they all did these "bad" things—and the Indian had only the one place to go to, hence would escape.

There was no criminal class among the Indians, no line of distinction between rich and poor; no locks and bars, no jails, no courts, no petty larceny, and yet he prospered without the aid or advice of the white race. There was no de Medicis to slaughter all who opposed the "religious" faith of the rulers of church and state; no Inquisition; no do thou, or be damned injunctions; no crusades or crucifixions; no sickly spectacles of murdering at large to extend the royal possessions, and institute the "gospel" by flame and sword. No, the Indian is a foolish creature. He is honest, at least in his religious pretnsions, and he lets his neighbor worship and slaughter according to his tastes.

Truly, the Indian prophet, Sitting Bull, has been styled a bloodthirsty savage, but in the estimation of his own people it has been a saintly savagery. Witness the deadly parallel in history, where the religious fervor of emperor and popes has been equaled only by their ferocity and zeal in wars of persecution. "The god of the Dakotas won for us the victory of the Little Big Horn," says the Indian. As in the Dark Ages a Roman monarch pronounced the head of the church "divine," and following the parallel, did not Charlemagne, by fire and sword FORCE the "faith" upon the world, as then known. But, doomed by her decaying foundations, Rome, once proud, supreme, fell, even as did her own victims, nations, succumbing to her heartless tyranny. When all is darkness and oppression, behold a light! A Luther rises, and the vital spark is kindled in the human breast.

George Fox, standing alone, defies a thousand ages of aggregated falsity and suffering, and the echo of his potent voice still resounds in the glorious anthems of our nation's freedom. Poland falls! And the tyrannous Muscovite hears retribution in the "Banzai" cry. Spain shocks the world with unspeakable "holy" cruelty, at last to cringe and crumble at Santiago and Manila Bay. Or Huguenot, or "Quaker," or Indian, or slave, all have been made to suffer under the pretext of "holy faith,' and each and all have triumphed and survived.

Truly doth mankind need redemption! But it shall not be through the stereotyped and obsolete way of ecclesiasticism born of barbarism. It comes and must be fulfilled through the truly spiritual agency of Justice, Intelligence, Kindness and Right. There is an Inward Light to guide thee, O, Pilgrim! and there is a "still, small voice that is mighty to save. It is the Spirit of Divinity—the true Redeemer—the One and Only Father of all mankind.

Thanks to the beautiful spiritual philosophy, there is no death. Thanks to the liberality of its teachings, new light is beaming in upon the human mind! Thanks to the simplicity of the spiritual faith (like the early followers of Jesus—who returned to earth in spirit form), it needs no imposing temples, nor creeds, nor man-made rituals and ceremonies, for it is of the mind and soul, and not only for the ear and eye; is psychical rather than physical; rational instead of emotional; operates through the intelligence rather than through fear; spurns all coercive doctrines; begets happiness. In its highest potency Spiritualism is but the evolution through the human consciousness of the soul's aspirations; is born of Eternal Spirit, and is destined to lift the world from out of the chaotic gloom of superstition, fear and ignorance.

Eye Glasses Not Necessary

Eyesight Can Be Strengthened, and Most Forms of Diseased Eyes Successfully Treated Without Cutting or Drugging.

That the eyes can be strengthened so that eye glasses can be dispensed with in many cases has been proven beyond a doubt by the testimony of hundreds of people who publicly claim that their eyesight has been restored by that wonderful little instrument called "Actina." "Actina" also relieves sore and granulated lids, iritis, etc., and removes cataracts without cutting or drugging. Over 75,000 "Actinas" have been sold, therefore the "Actina" treatment is not an experiment, but is reliable. The following letters are but samples of hundreds we receive:

J. J. Pope, P. O. Box, No. 43, Mineral Wells, Texas, writes—"I have spent thousands of dollars on my eyes, consulted the best doctors in the United States, dropped medicine in my eyes for years and "Actina" is the only thing that has ever done me any good. Before using "Actina" I gave up all hope of ever being able to read again. Had not read a newspaper for seven years. Now I can read all day with little or no inconvenience."

Rev. Charles Carter, East Springfield, N. Y., writes:—I have made a severe test of "Actina" by casting aside my glasses and have not had them on since except to see what change had been wrought since the treatment began. My eyes gradually gained strength and power, and now my glasses are no longer necessary, for I see as well, if not better, without them. I recommend "Actina" to all my friends.

E. R. Holbrook, Deputy County Clerk, Fairfax, Va., writes:—"Actina has cured my eyes so that I can do without glasses. I very seldom have headache now, and can study up to eleven o'clock after a hard day's work at the office." "Actina" can be used by old and young with perfect safety. Every member of the family can use the one "Actina" for any form of disease of the Eye, Ear, Throat or Head. One will last for years, and is always ready for use. "Actina" will be sent on trial, postpaid.

If you will send your name and address to the Actina Appliance Co., Dept. 342N, 811 Walnut street, Kansas City, Mo., you will receive, absolutely FREE, a valuable book—Professor Wilson's Treatise on Disease.

MORAL PHILOSOPHY.

Lessons in the School of Life.

The record of a well spent life is the best monument that can be erected to our memory.

"Lives of great men all remind us
We can make our lives sublime,
And in passing leave behind us
Footprints on the sands of time."

There are those who rise to heroic stature of mind and soul as well as body. Their heroism differs in manifestation from the mediaeval knights and saints, inasmuch as these times differ from those.

Who are the men and women known by their deeds of noble achievements? And how did these reach the front? Have they some hidden secret of success? Or is the way they trod still open to others? The earnest workers of the present time may prove as fruitful of moral and spiritual results as the tiny acorn that springs up into the giant of the forest, to bear rich results for the coming time. Sunlight is still sunlight, whether its work be to thaw the surface of a polar glacier or woo the riot luxuriance of tropical life.

It does not require riches to do good. The penny of the widow is worth more to the donor than the dollar of the millionaire. While poverty may lead to vice, wealth leads to much more. Money covers a multitude of sins that the best detectives can never unearth. Riches are buried with the body; but character passes current everywhere.

We are employed in this world in various ways for the express purpose of evolving and perfecting character; and it will take us through time and eternity to accomplish this result in its completeness. Then you may say, if we can never perfect our character is it not a hopeless task to undertake it? We think it not a hopeless task, for many things are more or less perfect. When you can do something toward it every day, and understand that the effort is endless, but every step achieves a victory, that you gain ground and add something to your opportunities, conditions and means for making the next step easier and better—when you understand all that you will by-and-by begin to realize that it would be a calamity to have the struggle come to an end—a most dreadful thing.

Progression is endless and boundless. If you could reach the end and feel that all would be accomplished in which there is so much pleasure and satisfaction in the pursuit, you would feel like Alexander of old who "sat down and wept for more worlds to conquer." So, if the human soul had not a solitary modification to be made in its own character or condition, in the improvement of its own nature, if it had no weakness to be overcome and turned into strength, no folly to be led safely to a higher truth, no jungle to be transformed into the blooming prairie or gardens of sweetness and light—nothing more to do, it would weep for something more to conquer.

It would not be well for us to reach the very pinnacle of progression at the present time. The glory and joy of mankind inhere largely in the consciousness of conquest and achievement. This is natural.

Salvation is not pardon of sin or deliverance from it, nor escape from consequences of wrong-doing. A saved man is not one who sins and escapes the just consequences of his sins, but one who does not commit sin or one who ceases to commit sin and learns to do right. A person is thus saved from any particular sin. Salvation is not release from penalties; it is growth into good character. It is release from the error or sin itself.

The whole scheme of sacrificial atonement and imputed righteousness by a propitiatory sacrifice is entirely false.

Any person who knows the effects of wrong-doing should think: I will not do wrong, because it is wrong and because I shall suffer. I will do right so far as I can, because it is right and yields the greatest satisfaction. The true way to show sorrow or regret for lapses, faults, error, is by turning and doing better.

If we disregard a law of right action there follows a reaction from which we suffer, as cause and effect. The transgressor simply places himself outside the law and suffers in consequence, until he places himself in harmony with that law.

The lamenting of lost opportunities may aid us to embrace other opportunities which promote hope and confidence for the future. The possibilities of development become more available, so we may expect greater success of our latent powers as time unfolds our many resources.

Crime is hatched in fancied security from searching eyes and ears. The criminal does not realize that he is seen and known by spirit friends. We affirm that if criminals were cognizant of the close proximity of the spirit world and its inhabitants there would be a corresponding diminution of crime. While spirits do not and cannot shield us from the consequences of our thoughts and acts, they do inspire us to better deeds, better lives.

Deeds are born of thoughts, the forces that change a person's life for better or for worse. There is more potency in thoughts than deeds, and if bad thoughts can affect the social aura, good thoughts can give it life and purity. Many suffering or despairing people, sensitive to their surroundings, have been lifted out of that condition by the power of thought concentrated upon them. Per contra, sensitive persons are injured by the influence of their thought environment or the shafts of hard thoughts or calumny or slander hurled at them.

General Survey.

The Spiritualistic Field—Its Workers, Its Work, and General Progress, the World Over.

THIS GENERAL SURVEY DEPARTMENT IS ONLY INTENDED TO CHRONICLE THE ENGAGEMENTS AND WORK OF SPEAKERS AND MEDIUMS. A REPORT OF WHAT THE VARIOUS SPEAKERS SAY WILL NOT BE PUBLISHED, AS WE HAVE NOT SPACE SUFFICIENT FOR THAT PURPOSE.

KEEP COPIES OF YOUR POEMS sent to this office, for they will not be returned if we have not space to use them.

Rev. Sophia B. Seip, president O. S. S. Association, lecturer and platform test medium, desires a change. She will answer calls in any state, or at camps for a short or long period. Address her at No. 302 Alisky building, Portland, Ore.

Wm. Frederick Keeler of 37 Garfield Court, Cleveland, Ohio, is now at Lily Dale. He is enthusiastic over the appearance at the Camp. He says: "The grounds are very fine. It is a beautiful, restful place in June. There are between 250 and 300 people now on the grounds and much active preparation for the season is being made. All report good indications for the year."

Anna Kinstbe writes from Providence, R. I., that she sees her spirit friends every night.

The noted medium and lecturer, Mrs. Georgia Gladys Cooley, writes from Wellington, New Zealand: "I am having packed houses here every Sunday evening, and meeting with grand success in every way."

Rolla Stubbs writes from Long Lake, Minn.: "We had our Dedication Services of the Spiritual Temple, on the 7th inst. Mr. J. P. Whitwell of St. Paul, Mr. and Mrs. Hegdahl and Mr. Bush of Minneapolis, and others, gave some good and inspiring words, from this side and spirit side of life. We regret to say that Mr. J. S. Maxwell, president of the State Society, could not be with us on the account of his wife still being sick.

Maggie Henry writes: "Last Saturday we had medium's meeting at Universal Occult Society in Hall C, 77 East 31st street. Spiritual messages by Dr. J. M. Temple, Mr. Seybold, Mrs. Vaughn, Mrs. Kobberger, Mr. Stein and your correspondent. All appeared to be well pleased, as every person in the audience received a message."

George H. Brooks writes: "I am going out for a short trip in the State before I leave for Lily Dale. The 11th to the 14th I am to be in Fond du Lac; Rosendale the 16th; Ripon, the 17th; Grand Rapids, 18th, and 19th; Almond, 20th, 21st and 22nd; Antigo the 24th, 25th and 26th; Oakfield, 27th, 28th and 29th. The 29th we are to hold a board meeting of the State Association. I then shall return home."

Secretary writes: "Miss Lina M. Schanbacher, the graduated Morris Pratt Student, delivered her third and last of a series of lectures at the hall of the Progressive Spiritual society, and which was the closing service of the society for the season, until the first Sunday in September. She was frequently applauded, and by a good audience, who let loose of her with the hope that she may sometime return. She was followed by Harry Burgess on 'Indians and their religion.' Mr. Bloom also spoke briefly. Mrs. M. Moore, Mrs. A. W. Bloom and Mrs. Hilbert were the message barers, and Miss Rouble, I. S. S. A. Secretary talked on the Children's Lyceum and the Elgin picnic."

W. Brockway writes: "Mrs. Brockway closed her meetings for the summer season, Sunday, May 31, in a blaze of glory. The hall was packed to suffocation, many being unable to gain admission. She has been the bearer of many remarkabe messages from spirit friends during the past season, but on this occasion she surpassed any of her previous efforts. The messages were interspersed with the Dean Quartette, Prof. Nostun, and an encored solo by the sweet-voiced singer, Mrs. Louis Hasbrouck. Prof. Tisdale interested the large audience for thirty minutes, followed by Mrs. Brockway. Through the untiring efforts of Mrs. Brockway the Church of Occult Sciences has outgrown the capacity of Vincennes Hall. The much-earned rest by Mrs. Brockway will be taken in the far West. When freshened from rest and climate, she will return to her flock for another season's work early in September."

Mrs. Agnes McGowan, Secretary, writes: "The Harmonial Society of Spiritualists will celebrate their fifty-first anniversary in the Free Church, Sturgis, Mich. Saturday and Sunday, June 20 and 21. Speakers: Will J. Erwood, Battlle Creek; Mrs. D. A. Morrill, and Dr. J. M. Peebles, Battle Creek, Will J. Erwood was with us last year, and his work was well received. Mrs. D. A. Morrill is a new speaker to the society, but is well recommended by those who have listened to her in the past. We trust her inspirational thoughts will bring to all a brighter spiritual aspect of life here. Dr. J. M. Peebles is well known by all. We desire his presence that it will be a reminder of his work, when the church was dedicated and the many times he has been a worker for the society. The music will be conducted by Mrs. Myrtle French, assisted by Mrs. Fannie Tompkins, both of Sturgis. On Sunday no special service in the morning. The Church will be open at 10 o'clock a. m. Make your headquarters there. The program announcing exercise for the balancee of the day and Sunday can be had by addressing the president or secretary. We hope to see a large assembly at this, our 51st anniversary.

Mrs. C. McFarlin writes from Plainview, Minn.: "My mother's health has much improved since my return, and I am situated now so I can answer calls for short duration, such as funerals and weddings, and lectures of two or three evenings at a time, also for Camp-meetings. My address will be Plainview, Minn., until further notice."

The sixth grand picnic will be given by the Spiritualists' Society Light and Truth, assisted by the singing society, "Eintracht," on Sunday, June 28, 1908, at Hoerdt's grove, 2 E. Belmont avenue, Chicago, Ill. Bowling, footraces and all kinds of amusements for young and old. Western, Clybourn and Belmont avenue cars run direct to the grove. Everybody welcome. Tickets, 25 cents a person.

A. F. Hill writes from Boston, Mass.: "Years ago at a National Convention of Spiritualists, there was in the platform a plank to abolish vaccination. We gained a point on this line. I send you a copy of the act that became a law April 1, 1908, to protect children. Now, according to the law no child need be vaccinated Massachusettts. Child, in this case, means any person less than 21 years old."

W. F. Peck writes from St. Louis, Mo.: "The item in the last week's Progressive Thinker in which I am made to endorse W. E. Hart's mediumship is likely to prove somewhat misleading. I have never sat in one of his trumpet seances, and so am not competent to express an opinion thereon. I have witnessed some of his platform work, and regarded it fully up to the average of our accredited platform workers. If Mr. Hart could be surrounded constantly by elevating influences and associations, am convinced that he would prove to be a psychic of much power and usefulness."

The Harbinger of Light, Melbourne Australia, says: "Rev. Lole F. Prior has accepted an engagement with the Brisbane Spiritualists' Society, whose last speaker was Dr. Peeples. Arrangments are also in progress for a series of lectures by her in Charters Towers, which has not yet been visited by any public speaker. Charters Towers has a population of 25,000 and a good nucleus of Spiritualists."

Dr. Clarence S. Tisdale writes: "Having decided to remain in the city for the summer, I wish to announce that I will be open to engagement for lectures on Anthropology, Spiritualism, Theosophy, Occultism, Astrology, Sarcognomy, Phrenology, Psychology, and kindred subjects. Chicago societies wishing my services will do well to communicate with me at 231 South Hoyne avenue, or phone Ogden 831. Services free to Chicago societies."

Florence Peacock writes from Monticello, Minn.: "I would like to have any Spiritualists anywhere near Monticello write to me, and would be glad to answer the same. There are none here that I know, and being a stranger in Minnesota, I would like to get acquainted. I belong to the Temple First Spiritualist Society, of Buffalo, N. Y., Rev. W. M. Lockwood, Pastor."

Prof. Ransby writes from Toronto, Canada: "Just a few lines about Toronto and myself. Would like to see our work here on a higher plane, but I suppose it cannot be helped at present. There are some true mediums here who are doing the best they can in their way. I have been doing work here since 1904, but feel it is nearly done in Canada, and will go back to the States. I will be at Lily Dale Camp all the season, and hope to meet many old friends there. I shall get as many to go there from here, as I can. I kindly send greetings to old western friends, as well as those in Canada."

Theo. Corbiere writes from Tacoma, Wash.: "There are two Spiritual organizations holding meetings each Sunday evening here, but although there are several hundred who profess to believe in spirit return, there are only a few who, I am sorry to say, take interest enough to attend the meetings, therefore the associations are rather weak affairs. The Tacoma Spiritualist Association have a Mr. Home speaking for them now, while Mrs. Mary Stein has just closed a two-months' engagement, and while everyone who heard her was well pleased, the association is too weak numerically and financially to keep her any longer. She is a lady of fine personality. She went from here to Victoria, B. C., for two weeks; then she goes to Spokane for two weeks; then to her home city, Detroit, Mich. Any association wishing a speaker will make no mistake in engaging Mrs. Stein."

Mrs. C. Bergere writes: "The first of the semi-monthly summer socials of the Fraternal Daughters held at the home of Mrs. C. Bergere, on June 10, was a decided success, both socially and financially, and argues well for all succeeding events. That the combination social and wooden wedding celebration of Mr. and Mrs. J. Staner Adams will be a well attended and joyous affair we have not the least doubt. Substantial remembrances will also be conspicuous in their wooden stiffness. Something exceptionally good also is promised for the inner man. Don't miss it. Come one and all and bring your friends. Take Ogden avenue car to Winchester avenue, walk south to 348. 3rd floor."

The Spiritual Harmony Church closed its meetings May 31, until September. Had in our closing address Dr. Temple. Mrs. Louisa Vaughn was the message-bearer. All acknowledged. Mrs. Vaughn is open for camp-meetings; will lecture or give messages or both if it is so desired. Terms reasonable."

Mrs. Charles Fiel writes: "The German Spiritualists' Society, Philadelphia, Pa., closed meetings on June 11, at Eureka Hall, S. W. Corner 11th street, and Grand avenue, having had good audiences all the year. The Medium, Mrs. S. Snyder, and her control, Wild Flower, have unaided and without remuneration, not missed a Sunday nor Thursday meeting during the season. The meetings re-open second Sunday in September, 1908."

Ferd. C. Suhrer writes: "On Sunday, May 31, the Fraternal Order of Spiritualists held the last service of the season. While many were reluctant in giving up their only place of meeting, the trustees considered the coming warm weather and the comfort of the people and decided to give them and the mediums a much needed and deserved vacation after one of the most strenuous and productive series of services ever inaugurated in the Cause of Spiritualism. Our friends say that through our efforts Spiritualism has been presented to them in an entirely different and acceptable manner. Its many beautiful living truths almost hopelessly buried in the quicksands of ridicule have been resurrected, as it were, shining in all their beauty, bringing sunshine and happiness. As a grand and fitting finale our concert on Monday evening, June 1, was all that could be desired. Rare talent freely furnished by our devotees and friends provided an entertainment rich in quality with a laugh every minute (almost). Every chair in sight was quickly filled and more were provided as the people crowded in. A larger gathering was never seen in old Hygeia Hall. At the conclusion of the concert willing hands quickly cleared the floor of all unnecessary chairs and the waltz and twe-step engaged the attention of the younger element. The "irrepressible" ice cream and cake made its appearance about this time, which helped much to give the affair an agreeable finishing touch. At 12 o'clock we said "good-bye" to old Hygeia until next season."

Rev. J. H. Demby writes "The Progressive Spiritual Church will move from their dear old home, 3329 Vernon avenue, into its new hall, 2959 State Street, on the 28th of June, and hold its first first meeting at the same hour on Sunday, June 28. Old and new friends will please take due notice and be on hand for the rousing spiritual opening of this new location. The regular services will be held and the doors of the Church will be open for new members."

Hattie F. R. Peet, Corresponding Secretary, writes: "Members and friends of the Band of Harmony, please do not forget to attend the Summer Social, which will be held at the home of Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, No. 3802 Ridge avenue, Rogers Park, on Thursday afternoon and evening, June 18. Interesting exercises in the afternoon and progressive euchre in the evening. Ladies please bring lunch; coffee served at 6 p. m. Score-cards 25 cents. Coffee checks 10 cents. Come and have a delightful visit in this beautiful suburban home."

At the present rate of orders for Dr. T. Wilkins' Book of Poems, the edition will soon be exhausted after its publication. It shows the popularity of these soul-poems, with the readers of The Progressive Thinker. If one hundred persons will guarantee the payment of $1.50 each for a gilt-edge, souvenir edition, that number will be thus furnished. Write him to that effect if you prefer one of the souvenir edition, 40 Loomis st.

Will C. Hodge writes in private letter from San Diego, Cal.: "As stated in enclosed article for publication, Brother Loveland "went out" without a single dollar to his name. I assumed all responsibility with the undertakers, taking the chances of reimbursement by the friends. Am "shy" at present, writing to the amount of $26.50. If you know of any one having more dollars that they know what to do with, and are generously inclined, just ask them to enclose a V to my address to help out. Have had not time until now to send anything but the bare announcement of Brother Loveland's passing on."

Dr. T. Wilkins, President I. S. S. A writes: "Remember the Elgin picnic, Sunday, June 21. Be at the Fifth avenue Aurora & Elgin Electric terminal promptly between 9 and 10 a. m, to secure your tickets in bunches of six round-trips for $5.00. All be ready the day before with your lunches. Don't be lagging.

Washington News.

The First Association gave a euchre party at Mr. F. A. Wood's residence, also at Mr. and Mrs. Shaws. Quite a sum was realized for the benefit of the association. The picnic was well attended both by old and young, with a trip down the Potomac to Marshall hall. Marshall hall is an old colonial residence surrounded by a beautiful lawn, the former home of the governor of Virginia. Across the river is the home of Geo. Washington, Mount Vernon. Gov. Marshall and Geo. Washington were neighbors, visiting across this famous river.

Mrs. Elizabeth Stewart, an old pioneer Spiritualist, celebrated her eightieth birthday May 29, at her apartments in the Pontiac. Mrs. Stewart is a cousin of the poet, Longfellow, and also Harriet Beecher Stowe. Beautiful flowers were received from her home state, Maine. Many friends were present to do her honor. Mrs. M. T. Longley made some remarks congratulating her on being eighty years young, though as youthful as a lady at sixty.

Mr. Pierre Keeler, the slate-writing medium, with his family will leave for Lily Dale about the middle of July.

Mr. and Mrs. Geo. W. Kates will be found at the N. S. A. headquarters, 600 Pennsylvania avenue. All correspondence will have prompt attention as in former years.

Mrs. M. Zoller Leese, of Philadelphia, was a caller at the N. S. A. headquarters. She received her certificate from her state as missionary.

OUR SCHOOL.

Something More About the Morris Pratt Institute.

To those who think they are or have been sacrificing for the Cause of Higher Spiritualism, we want to say a few words regarding the sacrifices that have been made and are being made at the Morris Pratt Institute.

First: It was a grand thought, an inspiration with the builder and founder of the school, Morris Pratt, from the first—it was a promise made to the spirit world, and he and the spirit world are behind the movement to perpetuate the school. This can be discerned in its constant growth and growing popularity. The gratitude of Spiritualists is due this pioneer Spiritualist and financier of Whitewater, Wis.

Second: There never was a person in the ranks of Spiritualism who sacrificed more than our late Brother Moses Hull. His untiring zeal for the education of rostrum workers always stood out in his lectures, even when he knew he would be misquoted and his language misconstrued. He neither looked to the right nor the left, but ever kept his eye on the one object of his life; the education and unfoldment of the human mind in an unbiased manner. He was the lion of the debating field, and feared no foe. His work in-field was to teach the orthodox Christian how to read and interpret the Scriptures from a spiritual instead of a literal standpoint, and he left no doubt lingering as to the feasibility of his interpretations.

Third: It is no easy matter to judge how much of a sacrifice has been made by Mattie E. Hull, the psychic teacher, through ill health, through her untiring labor of love and devotion to the Cause, always striving to make someone happier and better, as well as mentally elevated. She is still sacrificing, with a soul full of candor and sincerity. Go ask the recent graduates of her work, and drink in the replies, and you will see what her work is doing for them.

Fourth: The Principal of the school is a man of the best and highest inspiration, kind and loving, gentle, yet positive in his discipline and strong in his convictions for the highest in Spiritualism. Prof. A. J. Weaver is the right man in the right place. He has received no salary, just his living, and has put in as much time as though has salary was $1,500 to $3,000 a year. In fact, he could not do much more if he tried, for his health and strength would not permit it. Is it to be taken as an indication that he has a selfish motive in view in the upbuilding of this school? Perish the thought.

Mrs. L. S. Weaver, his good wife is ever at his side, and has been one of the financial backers of he Institution, as well as the mother of the School, faculty, students, board and all, and is the assistant secretary of the Association. Her work and her kindly advice and motherly face is a light to the institution, that deserves no little comment.

Mrs. Niver, a daughter of Moses Hull, has won the hearts of all who know her, by her untiring effort to make the students masters of their voices, their nerves and their minds, as well as their personalities on the rostrum. To note the feeling of all the students for this little bunch of smiles, grace and love, will give some idea of her real value. Her place in the school would be hard to fill, and she has never more than gotten a bare living out of it.

In fact there can be no fault found, justly, with the management of the school. There may be those who are foolish enough to believe that education is a waste of valuable time, and that to depend on the spirits to teach is all-sufficient, and of course not so much can be expected of such Spiritualists until they grow—perhaps not on this side of life—towards the advancement of the educational movement in Spiritualism. But there are those who can send students who aspire to the Spiritual rostrum, and those are the ones this series of articles will appeal to, and it is the honest purpose of the writer to enthuse and awaken such to a full perception of their duty to the coming generations of speakers and mediums, to assist in their education, that they may have a better start than did their ancestors, the pioneers of Spiritualism.

We can give nothing that will speak louder and more forcibly for the School than to reproduce a part of the paper read to the Unity Society, of Milwaukee, Wis., recently, by a graduate of the same, Miss Eula M. Golden, of Angola, Ind., with the write-up by the Milwaukee Free Press. This paper was her graduation essay during commencement exercises:

"Too many young people enter matrimony, blinded by the glare of gilded air castles built during a romantic tete-a-tete in a hammock or during a moonlight stroll."

This was the declaration at the meeting of the Unity Spiritual Society in Severance's hall last night of Miss Eula M. Golden, Indiana, one of the class graduates this year in Morris Pratt Institute.

Speaking on "What Is Lacking In a Girl's Education," Miss Golden, who is not more than 20 and as sweet and pretty as the average girl member of a graduating class, took occasion to "knock" the modern parents and school teachers for not spreading out more generally in educating the girl.

"Too many young people enter matrimony mistaking an assortment of childhood dreams for a life-long love," she said, "and as a result, after the little honeymoon of bliss is over, they discover each other and are miserable, afterward. I do not attempt to explain why the young man is this way. But in the woman, it is the result of false modesty, taught and encouraged by tutor and parent alike. False modesty should not be taught any more than woman's suffrage should be encouraged.

"The parents should take the young girl in their confidence early in her life, teach her what she ought to know and not until this is done will the number of young girls 'going wrong' yearly, be lessened. Teach the girl heredity, let her know that there is something in genealogy and see that she receives plenty of such exercise as will make her physically sound. Instead of teaching her Latin, Greek and some of the dead languages, teach her the language of Mother Nature, which will bring about her development and health which will in turn speak out for the purity and healthiness of the soul.

"And as for woman's suffrage, I believe it, like charity, should begin at home. Let the mother teach her son what is right, show him that she is mother in spirit as well as nature and suffrage will never be needed, for her son, when grown up, will vote for such things as will benefit the feminine sex."

WILKNS THREE June 13

Miss Golden read her paper at the graduation exercises in Morris Pratt Institute recently, and it met with such approval that she was asked to speak in Milwaukee as well as other places. She is from Angola, Ind.—Milwaukee Free Press.

Having heard the whole paper, it is but fair to add that the part herewith reproduced is only a sample of the entire address.

THE PASSING OF J. S. LOVELAND.

A Tribute from Another Veteran in Our Great Cause.

By the last Progressive Thinker, I learn that another apostle of modern Spiritualism has gone to the better country. At first the news struck me with a feeling of sadness, I do not know why, unless it was because I loved him very much. Indeed I almost or quite revered him. I believe the first lectures ever delivrd on modrn Spiritualism were delivered by him in the city of Boston. He was at that time a Methodist minister and was located at or near Boston. Within a very few weeks after the manifestations at Rochester, there were some kind of similar manifestations in Boston, and Brother Loveland became convinced that they were what they claimed to be, and preached a discourse upon the subject. This was followed up by another discourse and still another. The interest in his lectures attracted wide attention and demands came for lectures in Charlestown and I think Cambridge and Salem, and possibly other places. At the same time the M. E. church, or at least many of the ministers of that society undertook to "down" the new cause by declaring from the pulpit that the raps proceeded from the devil. Thus a breach grew up between him and his brethren, which widened till he withdrew from that organization.

Brother Loveland was at one time, and probably till his death, one of the most thoughtful and forceful lectures on the Spiritual platform, and this, too, at a time when Spiritualism boasted of the most profound platform lecturers in the world. He was analytical, logical and very profound.

I wish some one would write his biography, but how many readers would it find if written? For the last several years he has dropped out of the lecture field, and has written but very little, and a new class of Spiritualists have come onto the stage of action, who have heard but little of him and of course, could not be expected to have the interest in him that we older and earlier Spiritualists have.

Brother Loveland was kind and gentle, and though he was very positive in his ideas, he never could be accused of being anything but broad minded by those who were acquainted with him. Well do I recollect him, and the meeting of himself and another lecturer, who never could agree with him on the "God Question," in my room in Santa Barbara. I confess I was a bit uneasy, for I expected them to lock horns, and perhaps manifest some bitterness, as this other party was somewhat narrow and uncompromising. But Brother Loveland greeted him with a smile and a hearty handshake that disarmed all animosity. The conversation was mutually interesting to all three of us. Both parties were of the same age, 84 years if I remember rightly, which would make them now about 88 years old.

All the old workers are going. Soon there will be none who buffeted the storm of opposition then waged against us, left on this side of life. I believe I can count on my fingers the pioneer lecturers and writers now on this side of life, who at one time formed a bright galaxy of Spiritualism. There is J. M. Peebles, Lyman C. Howe, Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, A. B. French, Hudson and Emma Tuttle, J. R. Francis, and possibly one or two others yet remaining, waiting at the "golden gate" for the call to come home.

Since the advent of modern Spiritualism there has been almost a complete revolution of religious ideas, and Spiritualism has contributed probably more than any other cause to that revolution, and the sainted ones gone to the other side of life who championed the cause of Spiritualism, and the few above mentioned have been the gladiators in the arena.

THAT ELGIN PICNIC.

Will Be Held SUNDAY, JUNE 21, 1908

Do not forget the Picnic to be held at Elgin, under the auspices of the State Association and the Chicago Spiritualists' League. Everybody will enjoy this trip, the fresh air, the feast of reason and feast of the appetite, that always awaits them on these occasions at Elgin. This is to be established as an annual picnic, and should be the coming event of the season's opening. Good speeches and good messages—the ever-welcome spirit-messages will be a part of the order of the day, and the Children's Lyceum will receive its share of attention, and the children themselves—well they will be the guests of honor, and will enjoy the attentions to be given them, no doubt. Keep this in your memory: All must provide a lunch for themselves and the children. Coffee will be furnished on the grounds by the ladies of Elgin. The society is as one in the preparation for the reception of our people, for they know this means an interesting and profitable day for Spiritualists and Spiritualism. Take all the lunch you can carry—you will not need to carry any of it back home with you in your hand.

P. S.—In order to go in a "bunch," let all who are going to the picnic be at the Fifth Avenue Terminal of the Aurora & Elgin Electric Railway at from 9 to 10 a. m. Trains start at 9:20, 9:50, 10:20 and 1050. All should start as early as 10:20, to get to Elgin 11:57, at the latest. Dinner will be served pretty soon after the 11:57 train. Be prompt at the station between 9 and 10 a. m. Six-ride tickets for $5, is the best rate that can be had, and people will please "bunch up," for the occasion.

Lyceum Lesson Suggestions.

Spiritualists, Speakers and Mediums: Two numbers of Lyceum Lessons have gone forth, and from what we hear they are well liked. It is now time to prepare the next issue and it occurs to me that the preparation of lessons should not be confined to a few but should be the work of each and all. I therefore appeal to you, each and all, to get your thinking caps on and write us a lesson for the next issue, or if you cannot possibly take the time to do that, then just tell us the subject that you think would make a good lesson and we will be glad to try and work it out.

Nearly everyone can think of a topic that would suit; now as you love the children, please help us to give them the best which it is possible to get.

Lyceum conductors are in position to know some times just what kind of lesson would suit their particular schools. Just tell us what you like, and we will do our best to furnish it.

Interest in the child of to-day is very marked; efforts are being made upon every hand to provide for the child according to need, and we as Spiritualists cannot afford to be behind the rest, but rather we should lead on in the great work for future generations.

I sincerely trust that you will gladly respond and send all lessons and communications to

New York State Association.

Report of H. W. Richardson, President, at the 12th Annual Convention.

A retrospective glance covering the field of work of the New York State Association of Spiritualists since its organization, reveals some disappointments; and yet with it all when considered in a broad sense there is much of encouragement. Among the objects for which this Association was incorporated, was to organize the Spiritualist societies of New York state into a general association; to foster, charter and maintain Spiritualist societies, for the purpose of mutual aid and co-operation in benevolent, charitable, educational, literary, musical, scientific, religious and missionary purposes, germane to the phenomena, science, philosophy and religion of Spiritualism.

Some of us at the outset may have hoped that the work of a decade and more would have established a good, strong working society, carrying on meetings and doing things outlined above in every incorporated village, and several such societies in each of the cities of New York state. Hence in this respect many sanguine Spiritualists are, no doubt, disappointed. But disappointed does not necessarily mean discouraged.

Other disappointments might be mentioned, but we pass them by as only the every-day experience in all lines of human activity.

As to the achievements, we find increased confidence and esteem clearly indicated in the attitude of non-Spiritualists toward our Association and our work, which speaks favorably for its permanency and future influence.
